

THE PEOPLE AND THE CONSTITUTION.

BY CECIL S. EMDEN

OXFORD
AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
1933

TO MY MOTHER

the number of voters. With the passing of the Act there finally disappeared the rigid principles of preceding centuries. Redistribution of seats was but the rectification of an anomaly which, by itself, would have left standing the barriers between the privileged and the unprivileged. The adoption of enlightened principles for widening the franchise not merely enabled the ancient barriers to be shifted—at first, it is true, only a little—but rendered inevitable the subsequent revision of the whole political structure.

By the middle of the nineteenth century modern views of representation were expressed in the works of writers on the Constitution. Representative government was regarded as coincident with representative democracy. The old ideas of representation had become obsolete. Lord Brougham, in his book on The British Constitution (1861), described popular choice as an essential condition of representative government, in contrast to the choice of the aristocracy, which had been effective prior to 1832. He regarded representative democracy, namely the system by which 'the body of the people, either in whole, or in a considerable proportion of the whole, elect deputies to a chamber of their own', as 'the great invention of modern times'.¹

Some years passed, however, before it was admitted that the whole people, and not merely a select number, should possess the franchise. Gladstone caused consternation in 1864 by announcing in the House of Commons that 'every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness or of political danger is morally entitled to come within the pale of the Constitution'.² Palmerston was shocked by this announcement; and, as Prime Minister, he wrote to Gladstone, a member of his Ministry, protesting against what seemed to him to be an assertion of the doctrine of universal suffrage. 'What every man . . .', he said, 'has a right to is to be well governed and under just laws.'³ In the following year, 1865, Disraeli, when commenting on Gladstone's dictum, spoke of the suffrage as a privilege 'to be gained by virtue, by intelligence, by ¹ The British Constitution, 2nd ed., pp. 29, 31, 89. John Stuart Mill's idea of representative government (Representative Government (1861), Chap. V) was 'that the whole people, or some numerous portion of them, exercise through deputies periodically elected by themselves, the ultimate controlling power. . . . They must be masters, whenever they please, of all the operations of government'.

² 175 Parl. Deb., 3rd s., 324.

³ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. II, pp. 128-9.

integrity'; and he expressed much doubt whether a democracy was a type of government suitable to this country.¹

These selective principles were left far behind in the extensions of the franchise of 1884 and after. When he was about to introduce the Bill of 1884, Gladstone declared that it was no longer a question of nice calculations. He took his stand, he said, 'on the broad principle that the enfranchisement of capable citizens . . . gives an addition of strength to the State'. And the Opposition as a whole did not display any marked interest in the meaning of the expression 'capable'.² When the vast extension of the electorate was undertaken in 1918, but small attention was paid to any need for justifying the full application of the democratic principle. The chief reason for the widening of the franchise was given by the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. Lloyd George, as the necessity for allowing those who had taken a part in the War to have a voice in the national counsels.³ Sir George Cave, the Minister chosen to move the second reading of the Bill in the House of Commons, remarked that the addition which was proposed to the number of voters 'excites no emotion whatever, except a feeling of satisfaction that, by making this addition, we shall approach nearer to the ideal of representative government, namely to make Parliament a mirror of the nation'.⁴ There was but slight opposition to the main proposals of 1884, and none to those of 1918. In recent years, the legislature has, wisely or unwisely, thrown off the old attitude of circumspection and restraint in dealing with the problem of the extension of the franchise.⁵

During the period of its enlargement, which has been briefly outlined in the preceding paragraphs, the electorate secured the ability to influence the course of politics otherwise than through the agency of its representatives. It has come to be recognized that the choice of the Ministry and the undertaking of important legislative changes are in some degree dependent on the disposition of the people, as

¹ 178 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1702.

² 285 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 107; 286 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1827.

³ 92 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 489.

⁴ 93 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 2134 ff.

⁵ In round figures the Representation of the People Acts raised the numbers of the electorate as follows: 1832, to 1,000,000; 1867, to 2,500,000; 1884, to 5,000,000; 1918, to 21,000,000; 1929, to 20,000,000.

expressed by their votes at general elections. This kind of development need not raise the apprehension that representative government is in the process of being superseded by direct government. The people's power has not become sufficiently extended to prevent their representatives from using a reasonable amount of discretion in the application of the general principles approved by the electors. The representatives retain their responsibility for government. But, in so far as the people acquire the capacity to govern directly, to that extent representative government is modified.

It is difficult to imagine any arrangement by which the people of a large State could take more than an extremely limited share in governmental activities. Apart from the choice of the party from which Ministers are to be drawn, direct government cannot extend beyond the exercise of elementary legislative functions (by such means as the referendum in some foreign countries) and decisions on the outlines of policy. The whole political organization would have to be drastically revised before it would be possible for government by means of representatives to be superseded.

The steps leading up to the direct intervention of the people in politics are not easy to trace. Although it was not until the nineteenth century that the Government was recognized as being pledged to follow the views expressed by the people at general elections, there was at a much earlier date a considerable use of individual pledges by parliamentary candidates. The second half of the seventeenth century may be taken as the approximate period at which Parliament began to secure a place in what Burke called 'the standing government of this country'. Almost as soon as this stage had been reached, the desire to exercise control over the votes of individual members on political questions became manifest. The first sign, then, of the people as a whole becoming articulate can be discerned in occasional attempts of constituencies to dictate to members what their attitude should be on matters of policy.¹

So long as members of Parliament continued to be regarded essentially as local representatives, whose duty it was to speak for their constituents only, it was difficult for the sum total of individual pledges to be interpreted as one general pledge, involving the Government in a liability to pursue a particular course of action. But during the eighteenth century members came increasingly to be regarded as representing the whole nation and not merely a locality; and this change of view helped to prepare the way for the new era which was to begin with the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

¹ See Chapter II (Influence of Constituents on Members).

Lord Brougham, in his book on The British Constitution, which was quoted earlier in this chapter, drew a distinction between direct and representative government which referred to the relations between individual members and constituents. If, he said, a constituency merely communicates its wishes to its member, or even its requirements, representation is still operative. On the other hand, 'it is not a representation if the constituents so far retain a control as to act for themselves'.¹ These remarks were written at a stage when it appeared possible that direct government might be extended by making members into mere delegates. But peremptory instructions to members to carry out the requirements of constituencies, which were occasionally used in the eighteenth century, did not obtain wide acceptance. Instructions of this kind, given between general elections, must be distinguished from pledges which parliamentary candidates grew into the habit of undertaking and which came to be collectively interpreted as binding on the Government.²

At the same time that the relations of members and constituents were developing in a manner which was to facilitate the increase of the power of the people as a whole, the period, say, of the four Georges, respect was occasionally being paid by those in authority to movements of public opinion. Why this was so it is not easy to say, for there were no recognized sanctions available, as there are in a system of government that is genuinely democratic. The Ministry did not depend on the votes of the people. The ultimate sanction of physical force probably provided a part of the explanation; and doubtless an increased understanding of the proper principles of government had its effect among both the politicians and the people at large.

¹ The British Constitution, 2nd ed., p. 33.

² It is noteworthy that it has been found necessary in several modern written Constitutions (e.g. Germany, Serbia, Denmark, and Switzerland) expressly to renounce the admissibility of members of the legislature acting as proxies. Presumably the explanation is a misgiving lest pressure be put upon representatives to advance local interests at the expense of national ones. For this reason, it seems, it has been insisted in some of the new Continental Constitutions (e.g. Germany and Serbia) that members of the legislature do not merely represent their constituents but the nation as a whole. Cf. p. 27 below.

The influence of public opinion at that period was less direct in its action than it is to-day. When party allegiances were insecure and majorities unstable, Ministers were more inclined to watch the attitude of members of Parliament than that of the people. But towards the end of the eighteenth century public opinion began to operate more as it does to-day, by inducing Ministers to follow the wishes of the people, regardless of the attitude of their representatives.

Even during recent years, when the enfranchisement of a large proportion of the inhabitants has rendered it advisable for party politicians to pay careful attention to public opinion, it has been difficult to ascertain the true state of the public mind. It was doubly difficult to do so in earlier periods. Opinions might be gathered in particular localities; but it was hardly possible to form any judgement of national opinion. As, however, methods of communication improved, the circulation of newspapers increased, and education was more widely diffused, both the scope and the activity of public opinion were enlarged. This course of events contributed to the feasibility of ascertaining the wishes of the people by means of their votes at general elections.¹

Before general elections were construed as decisions by the people, the most prevalent methods by which public opinion could be expressed were petitioning and the holding of public meetings. It is difficult to estimate the effect of these popular demonstrations; but it seems that, until the early part of the nineteenth century, they frequently received but slight attention. They were followed by the formation of political associations. These more highly organized mediums of public opinion were more effective than petitions and public meetings, and are still widely employed.²

Not only is it necessary for the attitude of the people to be prepared, so that they may make decisions, but the questions for decision must be prepared for them. In the eighteenth century there was no machinery for the requisite submission of issues. The party system, as then operative, was too undeveloped and insufficiently imbued with public spirit to perform this function. Party principles, in the modern sense, were non-existent; and any central organization of parties was of a rudimentary character, and, therefore, limited in its efficacy.

See Chapter III (Public Opinion and Government).

See Chapter IV (Public Opinion and Government (cont.)).

There was, moreover, a large number of members who did not own allegiance to party, and who acted and voted according to their own ideas or interests at any particular juncture. The electors were often ignorant of the political leanings, such as they were, of parliamentary candidates; and, when a new Parliament was elected, it usually happened that only a rough estimate could be made of the number of votes obtainable, on one side or the other. In these circumstances, general elections were incapable of being used for the purpose of interpreting the wishes of the electors.¹

Very soon after the first extension of the franchise, in 1832, party organization improved rapidly; and this improvement led to the acceptance of uniform programmes and uniform pledges by party candidates. Towards the end of the nineteenth century party organization had become so fully developed that the federation of local associations influenced the construction of programmes. Electors throughout the country, who were members of a party, were thus enabled to express their views, occasionally with some effect, on the selection of issues for determination at elections.²

The two kinds of decision in which the people now take a part—regarding the choice of Ministries and regarding policy—are usually closely associated. It was approximately during the same period, in the nineteenth century, that the ability to make both kinds of decision came to be recognized. But their two histories can be traced separately with advantage. They each disclose points of interest in the development of the relations of the Sovereign, Parliament, and the people.

The later Stuart sovereigns not only retained an unfettered ability to choose their Ministers; they sometimes changed the composition of the Ministry immediately before a general election. This practice, combined with the automatic majorities obtained by the Crown, excluded any power in Parliament or the people to influence the choice of Ministries. The free choice by the Sovereign was challenged by the House of Commons during the Georgian period. But, soon after the House of Commons had established its claim that Ministries were dependent on support in the House, the people began to be courted by party leaders, who knew that a redistribution of political power was inevitable. As a result, it was accepted, in the later nineteenth century, that the choice between alternative Ministries could be directly inferred from the results of general elections. It became necessary, too, for a Ministry, newly appointed during a period of Parliament, to obtain the approval of the electorate, through the election of a majority in its favour.¹

¹ See Chapter V (Parties and the People).

² See Chapter VI (Party Organization and Policy).

A few years after the Revolution of 1688, although the Sovereign's ability to choose his Ministers remained undiminished, there was some evidence of a slight connexion between the results of general elections and the course of policy. Progress in this direction was hindered, first, by royal and other intervention in election contests, and, secondly, by the inadequate representation of the people in Parliament, and their consequent failure to have issues submitted to them or to take an interest in politics.²

It was not until 1832 that the principle of the mandate was first genuinely operative. The passing of the great Reform Bill demonstrated how the election of a majority of representatives, pledged to a particular measure, could be interpreted as imposing an obligation on the Government to introduce it. Politicians saw the advantage, from the point of view of securing a majority in Parliament, of inviting the new electorate to exercise its judgement in public affairs. With each extension of the franchise and with the disappearance of the old types of corruption, this advantage became more obvious. The electors were treated as capable, not merely of electing members, but of making decisions on political questions, such as the maintenance of free trade, or the disestablishment of the Irish Church.³

The undertaking of important legislative programmes, in which Ministries were involved in the course of the nineteenth century, prompted by unprecedented industrial and commercial developments, necessarily placed the Cabinet in a position of enhanced importance. When the House of Commons was more powerful than the Ministry, the constituencies did no more than attempt to control individual representatives. But, when the Ministry became more powerful than the House of Commons, it was the former rather than the latter that the people wished to control.¹

¹ See Chapter VII (The Choice of Ministries).

² See Chapter VIII (The Beginnings of the Mandate).

³ See Chapter IX (The People and Policy).

Even Sir Henry Maine, who displayed an attitude of suspicion regarding democratic progress, recognized, as early as 1885, that, owing to recent developments, 'the electoral body must supply the House of Commons with a mandate to alter the Constitution'.² And, shortly afterwards, James Bryce, when comparing the Constitutions of the United States of America and of England, described a general election in England as having become 'an expression of popular opinion on the two or three leading measures then propounded and discussed by the party leaders, as well as a vote of confidence or no confidence in the Ministry of the day'.³

Although no striking advance in the accession of the people to political power has been made since 1888, when Bryce wrote the above-quoted passage, the change which he mentioned has been confirmed and consolidated as a result of the experiences of subsequent general elections. Professor Dicey, in 1910, described Bryce's remarks as 'characteristically moderate'. The qualification of the nominal supremacy of the representative chamber by the notion of a direct appeal to the people, which was, at the time when Bryce wrote, partially true, had become, Dicey said, completely true in 1910. 'The time has arrived for the formal recognition of a principle which, in fact, if not in theory, forms part of our constitutional morality.'⁴ Dicey himself was not a person whose opinions on such a subject were likely to be exaggerated. An important part of his contribution to the understanding of the practice of government was his explanation of the way in which the conventions of the Constitution become absorbed into Constitutional Law, and in which de facto authority develops into authority de jure. He was, therefore, peculiarly qualified to verify the impression that the 'practical mastery' of the people was in the process of ripening into legal authority.

The above-quoted observations of eminent constitutional lawyers, which carry unquestionable authority in their own

¹ Cf. Lowell, Government of England, vol. i, pp. 421 ff.

² Popular Government, p. 118. Maine, like others of his period, did not welcome the use of the term 'mandate', which seemed to him to be adapted from the mandat impératif, which obliged a French representative to act in accordance with the instructions of his constituents.

³ American Commonwealth, 1st ed. (1888), vol. ii, p. 71; 3rd ed. (1893), vol. i, pp. 466-7.

⁴ 212 Quarterly Review (1910), p. 450.

sphere, may well prompt inquiry regarding the views of practical politicians. The latter, it may be suggested, do not exhibit the same unanimity regarding the development of the people's powers. Although, with the exception of one or two Liberals of the old school, no leading politician of the last half-century has questioned the principle of mandate, pressure of circumstances has caused party leaders to take divergent views in varying circumstances on the extent to which it is applicable. Politicians, although endeavouring to pursue a consistent course, would be more than human if, from time to time, they were not found trimming their sails according to the prevailing wind. An instance of this inclination to opportunism, which will require further notice in a later chapter, may be briefly mentioned here.

Gladstone, after the election of 1885, suddenly announced his intention to make proposals for the introduction of Home Rule for Ireland. As a result, he lost the support of a section of his party under the leadership of the Marquis of Hartington, who maintained that Gladstone had no right to initiate legislation on a subject of so great importance without first consulting the opinion of the electorate, and that the irregularity of the proposed course was aggravated by the shortness of the interval between the announcement of the new policy and the preceding general election.¹ Gladstone replied, unconvincingly as it seems, that no mandate was required to keep the law, by which he implied that the state of politics in Ireland fully justified measures of the kind which he had proposed and did not necessitate submission to the people. When, however, a fresh general election, within a year of the last, became inevitable, Gladstone, who realized that every effort must be made by him to secure the support of the country, placed the Home Rule issue unequivocally before it. He declared in plain terms that the people were called upon to decide by their votes at the election whether or not the policy of Home Rule for Ireland was to be adopted.²

These incidents of 1885 and 1886 are typical of the attitude which has been adopted on various occasions by the Ministry and the Opposition respectively. It will be seen that, as a general rule, a Ministry in office which retains a majority is disinclined to recognize that its proposals involve the necessity of an appeal to the people, while the party in opposition frequently maintains that the Ministry is transgressing constitutional usage by introducing important legislation which has never formed the subject of an issue at a general election.

¹ 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1241-2.

² See, e.g., his speech at Edinburgh on 18 June 1886, and the terms of the Queen's Speech prior to the dissolution of 1886, which are quoted on p. 286 below.

Not only have questions of expediency given rise to differences of opinion regarding the applicability of the principle of mandate, but genuine problems regarding the nature and the extent of the authority to be obtained have puzzled those who are anxious to see that the people's newly acquired political capacity has a fair chance of being exercised.

'We have in this country,' said Asquith in the House of Commons in 1910, 'slowly but decisively adopted democracy as our form of government. What is the essence of democratic government? Surely it is . . . that the will of the people . . . shall, both in legislation and policy, prevail. Further, we have come to the conclusion . . . the proper and only practical way of ascertaining that will and that opinion is the process, the rude process, the imperfect process, of periodical popular election.'

By this he meant, of course, that voting is the only positive means, and, as far as figures can supply the required information, the only calculable means, of ascertaining the answer to a question whether or not a particular course of policy or legislation should be pursued.

Asquith proceeded to remark on the inevitable limitations of the process of voting.

'The verdict of the country', he observed, 'is pretty clearly, as a rule, though not always, in favour of one party as against another. The verdict of the country is pretty clearly, as a rule, in favour of one set of measures or one line of policy and against the other. But when it comes to a particular case, the case of a particular measure or particular question, it falls open to a variety of constructions.'

'These', he concluded, 'are the inevitable defects of the system of popular election, which we share and suffer from, in common with all other democratic countries. But it is the only practical way of ascertaining the national will.'¹

Whether the defects are altogether unavoidable may be open to doubt. It is probable that they are to some extent due to the casual manner in which the principle is applied. At the present time, the working of the party system and other factors make the submission of issues a more straightforward matter in this country than abroad; but there is no clear understanding regarding the character and extent of the submissions to be made to the people at general elections. The principle of the mandate, as now applied, is productive of considerable ambiguity and uncertainty. And there is a frequent failure to realize that transformations of the party system, due to an increase in the number of parties, would seriously affect the distribution of political power, and would limit the present ability of the people directly to influence the course of politics. These remarks also apply to proposals to deal with the problem of the representation of minorities.

¹ 15 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1179. Cf. Lord Curzon's remarks, 6 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 945-6.

Any attempt to present the results of an investigation into a phase of British constitutional development during modern times is rendered difficult by the large element of unpremeditated modification to which the mechanism of government is subject. One of the necessary sequels to the operation of an informal Constitution, as opposed in some respects to a formal one, is the difficulty of detecting its lines of development. New conventions become established, and the distribution of power is varied without a full recognition of the extent of the change.

Until very recent years, the dominant position of the House of Commons in the British Constitution was the pride of the nation and the envy of foreign observers. The supremacy of the House of Commons was proverbial. Although the enlarged power of the people may be viewed with approval, it is well to appreciate that, whatever the increase in popular intervention in politics and in the power of the Cabinet, by that amount is the power of the House of Commons diminished. Less than a century ago, Bagehot described the Cabinet as 'a combining committee—a hyphen which joins, a buckle which fastens the legislative part of the State to the executive part of the State'. Since the time when Bagehot wrote, the situation has so greatly altered that nowadays there are some who think that the House of Commons is in danger of becoming a mere link between the Cabinet and the people.

CHAPTER II

INFLUENCE OF CONSTITUENTS ON MEMBERS

§ 1. Instructions and pledges at elections

THE medieval member of Parliament, grudgingly elected, went to the place of assembly conscious that he would more certainly consent to the taxation of his constituents than obtain any advantages for them. His chief function was to consent. He was unable to exert much influence on financial policy, and legislation was not a matter for him to discuss. He was regarded in all respects as a local representative, national affairs being outside his scope. And if, as is unlikely, his electors expressed to him their notions on governmental concerns, he was not in a position to do anything effective to forward them. But, as medieval grew into more modern times, there is some evidence of electors communicating their interest in general politics to their representatives; and, by the latter part of the seventeenth century, means were found of informing parliamentary candidates or newly elected members of the wishes of their electors. During the critical years of 1640 to 1649, the interest of the people expressed itself in 'instructions' to members by freeholders, requesting the intimation of their complaints to Parliament on such matters of grievance as monopolies and ship-money.¹ This method was used as an alternative to that of petition by counties to Parliament. It is to be observed that the members were not asked to take any action beyond that of communicating the grievances to the Legislature. They were not instructed to vote in any particular way.

An interesting broadsheet, which was printed in connexion with the campaign preceding the election to the Convention Parliament in 1660, provides an early example of common-form instructions to members to undertake a particular line of policy. They did not merely intimate the wishes of constituencies, but required that the wishes should be carried out. The broadsheet was evidently published in the hope that it would be utilized by many constituencies and that parliamentary candidates would be confronted with it and made to subscribe to its purport. The author was probably a reclaimed Commonwealth man. After reciting the sad experiences of the preceding years and the need for a happy settlement of differences, he asserted that members elected to the ensuing Parliament were 'obliged in point of duty and conscience' as 'publick servants and proxies, vigorously to pursue all such just prescriptions for the common welfare and establishment of our native country' as the electors 'shall present to them'. It was proposed to the electors that they should 'earnestly desire and require' their newly elected members to restore 'the antient Constitution' and 'the antient fundamental regal government', to advance trade, to regulate all exorbitant taxes, and to obtain a general Act of Indemnity. It should be added that, in so far as evidence is available to disclose the circumstances of the election of 1660, it appears to be unlikely that there was any organization to enable these instructions to be very widely employed.¹

¹ e.g. 2 Parl. Hist. 652; Rushworth, Hist. Coll., Part. III, vol. i, pp. 90-1.

A few years later a form of instructions, prepared, it seems, by the Earl of Shaftesbury for the election preceding the Parliament summoned for March 1681,² was probably circulated among the county constituencies by the vigorous agents of the Earl, with the object of being used as widely as possible in the election campaign. The instructions required the member to insist on a Bill to exclude the Duke of York and on 'an adjustment between the King's prerogative of calling, proroguing and dissolving Parliaments and the rights of the people to have annual Parliaments'.³ The Earl of Shaftesbury adopted several new electioneering schemes; and it is likely that the design of scouring the ends of his party by pledging newly elected members to uniform lines of policy, although not originated by him, was first utilized on any considerable scale at his instigation. If party organization had remained sufficiently active and competent to ensure, by the distribution of common-form instructions, that the issues of general elections were uniformly defined, the people's control over policy and legislation might have been expedited by many years. In fact, however, the device was not

¹ Although it is tedious in style, this broadsheet has a special interest in view of its early date and its comparability with later common-form instructions. It is accordingly reproduced in Appendix II.

² B. Martyn, Life of Shaftesbury, vol. ii, p. 266.

³ The instructions are reproduced in Appendix III. Cf. also Burnet, History of My Own Time (ed. Airy), vol. ii, p. 281. With regard to the probability of instructions being in common form, see 45 E.H.R., p. 573.

continued to any appreciable extent, with the result that individual constituencies were left to prescribe the pledges to be obtained from their particular members.

Not only was the election of 1681 memorable for the use of general instructions, but also for the use of instructions prepared locally in separate constituencies. At first, directions by constituencies were confined to the time immediately after election; and it is necessary to distinguish between these instructions—sailing orders, so to speak—and those which were given as and when emergencies arose, during the period of a representative's commission. It is apparent that, while the former type is capable of justification, the latter may result in the member being degraded to the position of a mere agent or instrument.

As regards the former type, it seems that the only sensible way of ensuring that the wishes of the electors are followed by their representatives is to insist on a promise prior to election. Instructions, as first used, had no such business-like basis. Perhaps the undertakings were postponed in deference to constitutional propriety. However this may be, it is likely that the electors realized that the sanction for enforcement was the same whether the transaction took place immediately before or after the election. In either instance, the remedy for breach of faith was postponed to the next election, since the possibility of calling upon the member to resign his seat had not then been realized.

The instruction of members by constituencies with Whig majorities in regard to the exclusion of James, Duke of York, in 1681 appears to have been general.¹ In the directions given by the County of Middlesex, the phraseology is suggestive of the novelty of the expedient. They were as follows:

'The Address of the Freeholders of the County of Middlesex, made and delivered in writing the third day of this instant March, 1680 [1681] at Hamstead Heath, unto Sir William Roberts, Knight and Baronet, and William Ranton Esquire; after they were declared to be elected Knights to represent the said County of Middlesex in the next Parliament to be holden at Oxford the one and twentieth of this instant.

'Gentlemen, we the Freeholders of this County have (in great confidence of your integrity, wisdom and courage) now chosen you, to represent us in the next Parliament, to be holden at Oxford on the 21st day of this present March. And although we do not in the least question your faithfulness to the true interest of this nation; nor your prudence in the management thereof. Yet esteeming it greatly our duty, in this unhappy juncture, wherein our religion, lives, liberties, properties, and all that is dear to us, are in such eminent danger, to signify our pressing dangers unto you. And accordingly we do request, that in the next Parliament wherein we have chosen you to sit and act, that you will, with the greatest integritie and most undaunted resolution, join with and assist the other worthy representatives and patriots of this nation in the searching into, and preventing the horrid and hellish villanies, plots and designs of the wicked and restless sort of people the Papists, both in this and the neighbouring Kingdoms . . .

¹ See Vox Patriae: . . . being a True Collection of . . . Addresses . . . to . . . Representatives (1681). The Tories also used a similar form, see, for instance, The Bristol Address (1681).

'In securing to us the enjoyment of the true protestant religion, and the well established government of this Kingdom . . .

'In asserting the people's unquestionable right of petitioning . . .
'In preventing the misery, ruine, and utter destruction which unavoidably must come upon this and the neighbouring nations, if James, Duke of York, or any other Papist, shall ascend the royal throne of this Kingdom.'

A note is appended to the effect that the address was very gratefully accepted by both the elected members, 'and their answer returned to the great content of the Freeholders'. Instructions of other counties and of one or two boroughs, given at the same election, have been preserved. They resemble in their purport those of the County of Middlesex.¹

It is obvious that this development in the relations between electors and members would be first observable on occasions of intense political agitation; and the practice of giving instructions at election time is accordingly again found in operation at the election of November–December 1701, with the outburst of patriotic excitement exhibited as the result of the intervention of the French King into English politics. The County of Bucks asked its newly elected members 'to support the King [of England] with the most effectual and equal supplies; to restore and keep the credit of the nation; heartily to concur in such alliances as his majestie has or shal make for putting down the exorbitant power of France'. The members of the City of Westminster were 'to endeavour to support his majesties title, and defend the nation against the French King, who threatens to give a King to England, as he has done to Spain'. This was the substance of the instructions; but considerable variation was shown in their form. Some constituencies merely besought or recommended their members to do this or that; others stated that they expected such and such a policy to be pursued; the City of London went so far as to say: 'We earnestly desire and charge you'; while Bristol was bolder still with: 'We do direct and require you.'¹

¹ See, for instance, Bodleian Library, Ashm. 1681, 85, 88, and 89: Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1680–1, p. 203.

In more than one instance the instructions contained some attempted justification of the new departure. The City of Westminster talked of its 'undoubted rights', as also did Gloucester; Bristol had 'no doubt that we have a right to direct our representatives and give them our advice what is most necessary for them in our judgments, to promote and carry on in Parliament'. On the other hand, the County of Sussex disclaimed any right. 'It is not', said the electors, 'that we think we are able to instruct or direct you our representatives, how to discharge that high trust which we by our choice have called you to.'

This practice of issuing instructions was repeated in 1705 and 1715;² and the City of London, at least, continued it far into the eighteenth century. Horace Walpole was shocked, in 1761, when the City of London, some months after the elections, but prior to the Session, gave instructions to its members to promote an inquiry into the disposal of the money which had been granted in connexion with the war, and to consent to no peace, unless all, or very nearly all, the conquests were retained. Thus, said Horace Walpole, the City of London usurps the right of making peace and war.³

Members were still primarily regarded as local representatives, and the idea of the majority of Parliament representing the majority of the people had not yet developed. In so far as the practice of giving instructions at election time did not compromise the reasonable freedom of the member by the use of too particular and peremptory expressions, it was capable of justification. It evidenced a more lively interest of the people in public affairs, and it provided an obvious precedent for the exaction of election pledges, a practice which prepared the way for the development of the principle of mandate in the nineteenth century.

¹ Luttrell, Brief Relation of State Affairs (1857 ed.), vol. v, pp. 115, 119; The Electors' Right Asserted, with the Advices and Charges of Several Counties, Cities and Boroughs in England to their respective Members of Parliament, &c., 1701; The Cornish Hug . . . being Instructions of the County of Cornwall, 1701; The Postman for 25-7 Nov. 1701. See also Daniel Defoe, The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England, examined and asserted.

² The History of the Reign of Queen Anne digested into Annals, Year the Fourth (Boyer), p. 15; The Political State of Great Britain, vol. ix, pp. 163 ff.

³ Gentleman's Magazine, May 1741; Sharpe, London and the Kingdom, vol. iii, p. 70; Horace Walpole's Letters (ed. Toynbee), vol. v, p. 128.

The exaction of election pledges, or promises prior to election, soon followed and became prevalent at the elections of 1774 and 1780; and it was possibly in use as early as the election of 1768. The City of London and the County of Middlesex were pioneers; and Wilkes, at a meeting of the freeholders of Middlesex in 1774, engaged himself to promote Bills for the shortening of Parliaments, the exclusion of place-men, and the reform of the representation. Four out of five candidates for the City of London signed pledges to work for a Bill to enable the American colonists to tax themselves. The fifth refused on the ground that he objected to the principle of pledges.¹ The innovation was evidently regarded as a dangerous one; and many members at once took a firm stand and refused to accept such obligations. Burke was among the number; and his well-known remarks on this subject² were also made in 1774. Even the leaders of the Whigs disclaimed pledges as 'derogatory to their characters as senators, and restrictive of their rights as men'. At a Westminster election, early in the nineteenth century, Hobhouse, whose views were not regarded as illiberal, refused a request to pledge himself to the ballot, the abolition of house and window taxes, of the newspaper stamp-duty, and the repeal of the Septennial Act, remarking that 'my whole public life is the best pledge that can be offered'. Sir Francis Burdett, whose reputation as a consistent reformer was unimpeachable, described pledges as 'a system of self-deception by which knaves are taught to catch fools'. These words may have suggested to Francis Place his better-known remark, to the effect that 'none but fools demand pledges and none but knaves give them'. Prominent Radical candidates, like Joseph Hume, adopted a similar line.

The unexampled nature of the Reform issue in 1831, which marked the development of the particular pledge between constituency and representative into that of a general pledge between people and Parliament, brought about a complete change in the attitude of candidates. Conscientious objections to the impropriety of pledges were swept away. The Duke of Wellington mournfully admitted that 'there was scarcely an election, even in a corrupt borough, in which the candidates were not called upon to give pledges, and did not pledge themselves to vote for Reform', while Lord Eldon expressed his 'deep sense of humiliation' at the conduct of the members of the Lower House in this respect.¹

¹ Cooke, History of Party, vol. iii, pp. 201-2; Lloyd's Evening Post, 3-5 Oct. 1774.

² Quoted on p. 25 below.

During the debates on the great Reform Bill in 1831,² Lord Lyndhurst said that 'the members of the present House of Commons can scarcely be considered members of a deliberative assembly, but delegates sent out by the people for an especial purpose'. That they were sent out by the people for a special purpose was obvious; but they were not mere local delegates, proxies, or agents, in the phraseology adopted by the Radicals. Parliament was for the first time charged by the people with the carrying out of a specified policy. It is sufficient, in the present chapter, to take note of the sequence by which the relations of constituents and members formed the basis of the new relations of people and Parliament. From 1832 onwards there has been a growing tendency for pledges to be uniform party pledges and not merely individual ones; but a discussion of the development of the history of the general pledge or mandate is reserved for later chapters.

§ 2. Instructions between elections

The issue of instructions by constituencies to members at times other than election times was a serious extension of the practice which has been mentioned in the preceding section. It was much more likely to debase the status of the member. It seems to have been an extension rather than a separate development, since there is very little evidence of this type of instruction before the eighteenth century. The so-called instructions of the middle of the seventeenth century, some of which seem to have been given between general elections, were messages rather than directions.³

Andrew Marvell's letters to his constituents at Hull have been quoted as proving that instructions were given to him during the course of Parliaments. His close relations with the Corporation of Hull are a matter of very common knowledge; but the instructions he received from time to time are of a local character; and his letters to that body regarding questions of general policy do not appear to evince more than a habit of reporting fully and frequently on the business before the House and the state of commerce at the time. It is true that on one occasion, in 1670, he wrote: 'What is your opinion at Hull of the Bill from the Lords for general naturalisation of all Forainers that shall take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy?' But there is little, if anything, else in the letters of a similar kind. As one of Marvell's editors has aptly observed, the inquiry regarding naturalization must have puzzled the Corporation. The truth seems to be that Marvell's anxiety to improve the political education of his constituents not unnaturally led him occasionally to assume in them a higher capacity than was warranted.

¹ For the extreme attitude taken by the City of London, see Annual Register for 1832, Part I, p. 300.

² 8 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 285.

³ Cf. p. 14 above; and see The Humble Petition of the County of Kent . . . with certain Instructions (1642), and Instructions from the Honourable House of Commons . . . to the Committee in Kent . . . Likewise certain Instructions from the said County (1642).

The extreme popular interest aroused by the Excise Scheme of 1733 was the occasion for the first important instance of instructions between elections; and many constituencies, including the City of London, sent formal instructions to their members to oppose any extension of the excise laws.¹ The member for Carlisle, Colonel Charles Howard, was among those who received instructions; and the description given by him, in a letter to his father, the Earl of Carlisle, of his reply to his constituents proves how difficult an intelligent and conscientious member found it to reconcile these instructions with his duties as a representative. He wrote from London on the 3rd of March:

'I . . . told them that, as I was ignorant what the proposal would be, I believed they, at a greater distance, could not be much less so; that if the scheme was right, to prevent frauds without detriment to the fair trader, or the liberty of the subject, their directions would prevent my giving my concurrence to it; if on the contrary it was attended with any of these inconveniencies that alarmed them . . . it would have met with my negative, had I not received their instructions; so I desired to know, whether they expected me to oppose it, in what light soever it appeared to me.'

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 95; Lord Hervey, Memoirs (ed. Sedgwick), vol. i, p. 134; Lord Mahon, History of England, vol. ii, p. 244; R. R. Sharpe, London and the Kingdom, vol. iii, p. 96.

This protest was effectual in inducing the constituents to withdraw their instructions and leave the member free to act as he thought right.¹

The borough of Colchester put its request to its members to oppose the Excise Scheme in strong terms; and, when one of its members protested, it told him that:

'if you vote for a Bill of that nature, even in the shape you seem to be pleased with or in any other, you can't reasonably expect our approbation since we are fully convinced that all excise laws are destructive to trade, innovations on our ancient rights, and altogether inconsistent with the true interest of a free people.'²

A political tract, which is thought to have been written by old Horatio Walpole,³ described this novel method of giving instructions to members as subversive of the Constitution. The author described the making of representations by constituents as proper and legitimate. But injunctions and positive commands, he said, involved a transference of the legislative power from Parliament to the people.

In 1739 and 1740 a large number of counties, cities, and boroughs issued instructions as a result of the agitation for legislation to limit the number of placemen in the House of Commons. The City of York, for instance, wrote:

'We are sensible that the spirit of a British Parliament can only be exerted in an assembly of men uncorrupted and independent; we do therefore insist and require you our representatives to join with those who shall be willing to promote a Bill to reduce and limit the number of placemen in the House of Commons.'⁴

Some members appear, on this occasion also, to have objected to receiving instructions on a matter affecting the general public.⁵

Walpole's resignation, in 1742, was the signal for a further

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), pp. 102, 103. ² Excise: being a Collection of Letters &c., 1733.

³ The Rise and Fall of the Late Projected Excise Impartially considered by a Friend to the English Constitution, 1733.

⁴ 58 Political State of Great Britain, p. 424; 59 Political State of Great Britain, pp. 47, 127 ff., 133.

⁵ The following letter was, it seems, sent by a member to a constituency in the north of England: 'In answer to yours of the 23rd of last month, as I have the honour to be one of your representatives, I shall always be ready to take your directions in every thing brought into Parliament, wherein your Corporation is particularly concerned; if I am convinced that it is for the benefit of it. But in matters of general nature, you'll allow me to judge what is best to do, a

use of this method, many constituencies recommending a strict inquiry into past measures, and pressing for triennial parliaments and the enactment of a measure dealing with placemen. The City of Bath concluded the instructions, which it sent to its members at this time, with what appears to be a thinly veiled threat. 'These are our sentiments, ye are our representatives, and we are your electors.'¹

The climax in the use of this kind of instructions was, perhaps, reached in 1756 and the following years of patriotic enthusiasm. 'Inquiry into the loss of Minorca and the situation in America was urged by the City of London and many influential constituencies.'² In the agitation regarding Wilkes and the Middlesex election of 1769 the City of London was again in the forefront and referred, not only to its 'indispensable duty', but also to its 'undoubted right'. London and other constituencies issued instructions in respect of the rights of electors, the preservation of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the reform of the law of libel.³ At a great meeting, held in February 1769, Beckford, one of the members for the City of London, declared that, if he received instructions directing him to take a course opposed to his convictions, he would consider himself bound to follow them. But there was a considerable body of feeling opposed to this enthrallment of the member of Parliament. The conclusion was reached, in some quarters, that the more proper method of the electors advancing their political opinions during the period of confidence I take to be reposed in every member of Parliament by their electors. As to what your letter refers to, I don't know of any such Bill to be brought in, more than common report; if there is, when I see how it's framed, I'll act therein as I think most for the good of the public.' (Great Britain's Memorial containing a Collection of the Instructions &c., 1741.)

¹ 12 Parl. Hist. 416 ff.; Catalogue of Prints and Drawings in the British Museum, vol. iii, p. 458. A tract, entitled Faction detected by the Evidence of Fact, by John Perceval, afterwards Lord Egmont, first appeared at this time. It obtained very wide and favourable notice and ran into several editions. It dealt sternly with the issuing of instructions by constituents; and it might be inferred that the author regarded Walpole's resignation as their first occasion. He described the instructions of the City of London 'not only as a direct and scurrilous libel on the administration, but the most seditious instrument that ever was penned and very little short of treason both against the King and Constitution' (pp. 96-7). The views expressed in this tract have a special interest, since Perceval had been an ardent opponent of Walpole and had supported an inquiry into the late administration, a course which was insisted upon in the instructions of 1742. Cf. Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i, p. 467.

² The Voice of the People, 1756; 25 London Magazine, passim. For instructions regarding the Jews Naturalization Act, 1753, see 23 Gentleman's Magazine, pp. 467 ff., and 22 London Magazine, passim.

³ Instructions given to Sir Robert Ladbroke, &c., 1769; 3 Political Register, p. 101; 4 Political Register, pp. 65 ff., 191-2.

Parliament was that of petitioning. Burke was among those who expressed this view.¹

Extreme Radicals continued to court and obey instructions; and an example of their attitude is provided by John Jebb, who drew up the following declaration for the use of candidates at the Westminster election of 1782: 'I do declare upon my honour that I will either act in conformity to their instructions or embrace the first opportunity of resigning my seat.' But, in the early nineteenth century, the Whigs were as much opposed to these notions as the Tories. Romilly, for instance, though an advocate of parliamentary reform, refused to bind himself to support it; and other Whig members studiously and openly repudiated liability to follow the views of their constituents. Even philosophical Radicals, like James Mill and John Stuart Mill, argued in favour of the necessity of the representative retaining full freedom to act in any circumstances as he might deem proper.

The common failure to discriminate between the two classes of instructions to members, which have been discussed in this and the preceding section, may to some extent be explained by the repetition of instructions to newly elected members which were first given in the periods between elections; but the very real difference between the two is worth emphasizing. The position of a member who undertakes on his election to accept his commission on certain principles is distinguishable from that of a member who is expected to obey the orders of his constituents from time to time on various questions as they arise during the period of his membership. In so far as the subject of the present study is concerned, the former class is important as marking a stage in the development of the constitutional position of the people as a whole; whereas the interest of the latter is more confined to a history of the relations of the member and his constituents, to which further consideration must be given in the remainder of this chapter.

§ 3. National representation

Credit has chiefly been allowed to Burke as the originator of the doctrine that a member of Parliament, when elected, represents, not his constituents, but the whole community. His insistence on the dangers of treating a representative as a mere delegate, expressed in his Speech at the Conclusion of the Poll,¹ has been quoted hundreds of times. Every one knows that Burke, in this speech, condemned the use of 'authoritative instructions, mandates issued, which the member is bound implicitly to obey', and that, in arguing for national as opposed to local representation, he observed: 'You choose a member indeed; but, when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of Parliament.'

¹ Cf. Burke's Correspondence, vol. i, p. 181.

The principle of national representation was a frequent factor in the arguments against the admissibility of the class of instructions which have just been mentioned; and, for this and other reasons, it will be well to obtain some idea how it developed.

Mr. Porritt, in his Unreformed House of Commons,² says that 'the idea expressed by Burke was not new. It had been put forward in Parliament as early as 1745 by Sir William Yonge, in a speech in opposition to annual Parliaments'. But it can, in fact, be traced back more than a century farther, at least as far as Coke's Fourth Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England, which was written before 1630. Coke remarked, in his first chapter, that 'though one be chosen for one particular county or borough, yet when he is returned, and sits in Parliament, he serveth for the whole realm, for the end of his coming thither, as in the writ of his election appeareth, is general'. It is not easy to appreciate Coke's object in making this observation; but he may have been more concerned in magnifying the function of the member than in opposing claims of constituencies to control those whom they elected.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century the principle is again asserted by Algernon Sidney, in his Discourses concerning Government, which were first printed in 1698, but which were written a few years earlier.³ 'It is not', he said, 'for Kent or Sussex, Lewis or Maidstone, but for the whole nation, that the members chosen in those places are sent to serve in Parliament'; and, though they might listen to the opinions of their electors, they were responsible to the nation alone.

It is tolerably clear that Burke's expression of opinion on this matter owes something to Sidney's statement, in form as well as in matter. Sidney's views, which might have been expected to favour the rights of constituents, resemble those of a more orthodox person, namely Edward Chamberlayne, the author of Angliae Notitia, the Whitaker's Almanac of the day. The number for 1679 and some subsequent numbers of this handbook contain remarks on national representation. Chamberlayne, while he regarded the members as each representing the whole kingdom, admitted that they should pay special attention to the needs of the constituencies by which they were elected.¹

¹ Works (1826 ed.), vol. iii, p. 19. See also his distinction between 'individual representation' and 'equal representation', made in 1784. Speeches, vol. iii, pp. 43-54.

² Vol. i, p. 271.

³ 1698 edition, p. 451.

The same principle is advanced from time to time through the eighteenth century, in such periodicals as the Freeholders' Journal,² and the Craftsman,³ and also in speeches in Parliament, by, for instance, Sir William Wyndham in 1733,⁴ and Sir William Yonge in 1734 and 1745.⁵ It was also mentioned by Charles James Fox in 1797. When speaking on Grey's motion for a Reform in the Representation, Fox admitted that, on the question of instructions, he leaned to the opinion, that, having to legislate for the Empire, members ought not to be altogether guided by instructions that may be dictated by local interests. And later in the same year, having observed that it was popularly held that a member should consider himself as the representative of the people at large, he acknowledged the impropriety of members complying with the wishes of their constituents, if that action should result in the prejudice of the whole nation.⁶

A century ago Brougham, in his treatise on the Constitution, pointed out that a member 'represents the people of the whole community'; but works on Constitutional Law do not nowadays enlarge on this doctrine. The prevalent tendency for constituencies to press their members to advocate local interests was in a large measure responsible for the repeated insistence on national representation. Now that the

¹ 1679 edition, Part II, p. 55. His remarks respecting attention to local requirements were omitted in the number for 1723 and subsequent numbers.

Charles Davenant, the political economist, while maintaining, in or about 1704 (Essays upon Peace at Home and War Abroad, Political and Commercial Works (1771 ed.), vol. iv, pp. 267 ff.) that constituents have a right to give instructions to their members, added the qualification that 'these are not such dictates, as their members must not depart from', since political representation was national and not merely local.

² 7 Mar. 1722.

³ No. 350, Mar. 1733. The principle was also relied upon in the famous tract by John Perceval, entitled Faction detected by the Evidence of Facts (1743), 2nd ed., p. 101, and in earlier tracts, e.g. The Freeholder's Plea against Stock-jobbing Elections of Parliament-Men (1701) [by Daniel Defoe].

⁴ 8 Parl. Hist. 1210.

⁵ 9 Parl. Hist. 450; 13 Parl. Hist. 1078. Yonge, in 1734, described the principle as not 'altogether new'.

⁶ 33 Parl. Hist. 728, 1111.

member of Parliament is much less concerned than he was with legislation of a local character, the need for emphasizing the principle is correspondingly reduced.¹ But the subject may regain prominence, in the event of sectional rather than general interests being promoted by members.

Although the principle of national representation was chiefly used to counteract an undue attention to the local aspect of a member's functions, its admission must have contributed to the increase in the control of the people as a whole over national policy, which is discussed in later chapters. It has already been remarked that the obligations of individual members arising as a result of separate pledges to their constituencies developed into the obligations of Parliament by reason of the separate pledges becoming general ones of a uniform character. The influence of the principle of national representation operated in a different way. It helped to establish that the obligations of members were due, not merely to separate constituencies, but to the people as a whole.

§ 4. Obligations of Members to constituents

Relations between members and their constituents cannot, as such, come under the jurisdiction of the Courts of Law. There are, however, occasions when the position of a member in regard to a political association may raise questions of legality. If bodies of constituents should propose to bind their members contractually to act from time to time as directed by them or their nominees, it is probable that such an arrangement would be unenforceable. There have been instances of attempts by trade unions (who occupy, for some purposes, the position of political associations) to bind members paid by them to vote as directed by the Labour party organization. If a contract of this character is illegal, similarly a contract to the same effect between other associations of persons and members of Parliament would also be illegal.

The maintenance of the freedom of action which is inherent

¹ In some continental countries, however, where the risk of deputies being treated as mere delegates or local agents is apparently still feared, special provision is made, in written Constitutions, regarding national representation. The Constitution of the German Reich (1919), for instance, provides in Article 21, that 'deputies are representatives of the whole people. They are subject to their conscience only and are not bound by any instructions'. Cf. p. 6 in the position of a parliamentary representative was treated incidentally in a leading case on the law respecting trade unions, The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne.¹ A trade union made it part of its arrangement with candidates whom it adopted and financed that they 'must sign and accept the conditions of the Labour Party and be subject to their whip'. In other words, the members of Parliament promoted by the trade union in question had to undertake to enter into a contract to do what they were told in their capacity as representatives. They had to give a pledge to follow instructions. Lord Shaw, in his judgement in the House of Lords, regarded this arrangement as illegal. He said that a member of Parliament 'is not to be the paid mandatory of any man, or organization of men, nor is he entitled to bind himself to subordinate his opinions on public questions to others, for wages, or at the peril of pecuniary loss; and any contract of this character would not be recognized by a Court of Law, either for its enforcement or in respect of its breach.'

Obiter dicta of some of the judges in the Osborne case indicate the extent of the danger to constitutional propriety which might follow if the essential freedom of action of a representative is unduly restrained as a result of pecuniary considerations. Lord Shaw, who dealt more vigorously than any of the other judges with this aspect of the case, pointed out that the use of capital funds of trusts and other organizations to procure the subjection of members of Parliament would imperil the whole prospects of parliamentary government.

There remain to be made a few remarks on some moral problems which have exercised members and constituencies in modern times in regard to their relations. Constituencies, though they no longer wish to treat their members as proxies, retain a close interest in the votes and speeches of their representatives in the House of Commons. A change of circumstances in politics during the period of a Parliament may bring the views of a member and his constituents into collision; or a member may indulge in a political volte-face without any external provocation. In the course of the last century or more, he has often had to consider whether he was under a moral obligation to resign his seat, and possibly to seek re-election.

¹ [1910] A.C. 87.

Wilberforce, speaking in the House of Commons in 1802, asserted that representatives should agree with constituents in the great principles of political conduct and in the general line to be pursued in any given conjuncture of affairs, but that the constituents ought not too scrupulously to look for an exact coincidence in every individual vote, and on every particular question;¹ and Canning, in an address given to his constituents at Liverpool at the election of 1812, reviewed the whole problem so fairly that, after more than a century, there seems little in his remarks that the most conscientious candidate of the present day could wish to amend.²

'It may happen', he said, 'that your own judgement may occasionally come in conflict with my own . . . In all such cases, I promise you not indeed wholly to submit my judgement to yours; . . . but I promise you that any difference of opinion between us will always lead me to distrust my own views, carefully to examine, and, if erroneous, frankly to correct them.'

And he added that,

'if, unfortunately, occasions should occur . . . on which there should arise between us, on points of serious importance, a radical and irreconcilable difference of opinion, I will not abuse my trust, but will give you the earliest opportunity of recalling or reconsidering your delegation of it.'

A convention has grown up, though it is not altogether of a rigid character, for members to retire or to seek re-election, if they change their party allegiance or their view regarding some vital political issue. As regards change of party, it may be noticed that the representative in this country is more in the position of a delegate than in, say, France, where it is easy to move from one political group to another without disturbing the relations between deputy and constituency. This difference is, of course, largely attributable to the existence in continental countries of many small parties of different shades of political colour.

Even in the eighteenth century, conscientious scruples occasionally led members to resign their seats on altering their political tenets. Wedderburn, who was elected to represent Richmond in Yorkshire as a Tory in 1768, felt himself in honour bound to resign his seat in 1769, on going over to the popular side and espousing the cause of Wilkes. But the first person of eminence to resign his seat after altering his attitude on a subject of prime importance was Peel, who yielded up his place as member for the University of Oxford at the time of his conversion to the need of concession to the Roman Catholics. He was aware that his constituents were, as a whole, hostile to concession at the time they elected him; and he regarded himself as pledged to them to oppose a relief measure. He did not succeed in obtaining re-election at Oxford University, but immediately gained a seat elsewhere.

¹ Cobbett, Political Register, 1802, vol. ii, p. 1617.

² Speeches, vol. vi, pp. 226-7.

Peel's resignation was criticized by his friend Croker as 'a democratical and unconstitutional proceeding, and a precedent dangerous to the independence of the House of Commons'; but it was Croker who, in the Reform election of two years later, pressed Peel to pledge himself against Reform.¹ It was certainly unusual for members, other than those of a Radical tendency, to act, prior to 1832, as if bound by pledges to their constituents; and Peel, when afterwards reviewing his behaviour of 1829, said that he vacated his seat 'upon the impulse of private feelings, rather than upon a dispassionate consideration of the constitutional relation between a representative and his constituents'. He even suggested that his example was not one which ought to be regarded as a precedent.² It was, in fact, followed in 1833 by Sir J. Hobhouse, Chief Secretary for Ireland, who considered himself under an obligation, by reason of his election declarations, to oppose taxes which the Liberal Government were about to introduce. Hobhouse resigned and sought re-election in the same constituency. His high moral sense did not, however, obtain immediate recognition, since he was not re-elected. Another example of conscience enforcing resignation was that of Lord Ashley (afterwards the Earl of Shaftesbury) in 1846. Ashley regarded himself as having been elected as a protectionist. He was converted in 1845 to the principles of free trade. Although, as he said, 'no pledges were given or asked', he felt that there was an 'honourable understanding'. Resignation was particularly galling to him because it disabled him at a very late stage from the conduct of his Ten Hours Bill.³ It may be noticed that only two other members in a similar position to his resigned.

¹ Croker Papers, vol. ii, pp. 7 and 101.

² Memoirs, vol. i, pp. 311-12.

³ E. Hodder, Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, vol. ii, p. 127.

This problem in the relations between constituencies and members has presented itself on many occasions in recent years. At the outbreak of the South African War in 1899, a few Conservative members took a view opposed to hostilities. In one or two instances suggestions of resignation by local associations were ignored. In the instance of Sir Edward Clarke, however, a definite request was complied with. On other occasions, members, who have crossed the floor of the House without seeking re-election, have been refused renomination by their local associations. One of the best remembered instances of a change of party allegiance without resignation was that of Mr. Winston Churchill in 1904. In the spring of that year he declared himself to be an opponent of the Conservative party, since he was unable to obtain assurances satisfactory to him respecting the adoption of tariff reform; and his adherence to the principles of free trade led him to decide to attach himself to the Liberal Opposition. He recognized, as he stated in the House of Commons, that his constituents were entitled to be consulted in regard to his change of allegiance. If they desired him to resign and submit himself for re-election, they had only to call upon him to do so. But he desisted from disorganizing the local party association in view of the probable imminence of a general election.¹ As matters proved, however, the dissolution of Parliament did not occur until twenty months later.

There have been other occasions on which seats have been retained by members whose change of party has happened late in the life of a Parliament. In this situation, it may well be that the general understanding shall not apply, without any implication that the election of a member is for the whole of the ensuing Parliament regardless of his political behaviour.

The course to be adopted by a member who goes into Opposition is made particularly difficult when his defection is due to the adoption by the Ministry of an entirely new policy which has never been in issue at a general election. He has, in these circumstances, some justification for arguing that the Ministry should go to the country and not the member, and that, if the Ministry has changed its main tenets, he at least should be allowed to retain the principles which he held when he last submitted himself for election. This was the attitude taken up by Joseph Chamberlain, when he broke away from Gladstone on the question of Home Rule in 1886. 'It is you who have changed, not I', he said, thereby implying that Gladstone's sudden conversion to a full programme of Home Rule, which only became generally known after the election of 1885, excused his leaving Gladstone's Ministry and going into Opposition. The question of his resigning his seat did not arise. He explained his position to his constituents immediately after parting with Gladstone; and they expressed their confidence in him. Indeed, he retained their confidence throughout his political transformation from a Radical to a Radical Unionist and from a Radical Unionist to a Conservative. Birmingham, in fact, always voted for Chamberlain as a 'Chamberlainite'.

¹ 192 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 1023.

In February 1931 Sir Oswald Mosley and five other members of the Labour party broke away and formed a 'New Party'. Although their withdrawal was strongly condemned in their constituencies, they did not consider it incumbent on them to resign their seats in Parliament.

A word may be added regarding the situation in which Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. J. H. Thomas found themselves in August 1931, when the Labour Ministry was succeeded by the Joint or Coalition Ministry.¹ The view was expressed in local party meetings in the constituencies of the two Ministers that their action in becoming members of the new Government necessitated the resignation of their seats, since the official Labour party had gone into Opposition. Both Mr. MacDonald and Mr. Thomas refused to take this course until the emergency in which the country was placed permitted it. Within a few weeks, however, they were re-elected at the general election.

The circumstances in which members change their party allegiances and political views admit of so many variations that it is impossible to discover any clear-cut rules of obligation. On the one hand, it is possible to agree with Macaulay that it is absurd to exact 'daily and hourly obedience'; and, on the other hand, it is indisputable that members cannot claim complete freedom of action regardless of their pledges on broad issues, which are the basis of the people's capacity to exercise a general control over changes in the policy of government. It must be remembered, however, that, owing to the ability of Ministries to remain in office for several years, during which many fresh political questions are bound to present themselves, and owing to the growing complexity of political issues, the ties of representation always tend to become more and more ineffective as the period of the legislature's life advances.¹ It has been truly said that any representation, which is not very transient, must necessarily imply a large element of licence.

The extent of the freedom of action to be allowed to a member depends on the view which is taken of the character of political representation. Mr. G. D. H. Cole² has argued that 'pure representation', without the admission of the necessity of a member acting even on the advice of his constituents, approaches nearly to false representation owing to the will of one being substituted for the will of the many. The will of one man, he says, cannot be treated as a democratic expression of their will. This argument has been criticized by Professor J. L. Stocks,³ who feels that Mr. Cole has forced an unnecessary meaning into political representation, which is a more complex business than one by which the electors commission the doing of something within their own capacity. Authority is not 'passed or handed over'; it only becomes effective by the instrumentality of Parliament. The action of the members is taken after deliberations between them. Both these writers, however, appear to maintain that the member should act upon advice and criticism which are morally binding rather than upon express instructions which bind him legally. But the relations between members and constituents, even though they exclude the subservience of mere agency, will, no doubt, continue to involve difficulties in practice. Much that has been said in this chapter illustrates the uncertainties which arise in the interpretation of the member's moral obligations.

¹ Cf. pp. 302-3 below.

² Social Theory, pp. 103 ff.

³ The Limits of Purpose, pp. 96 ff.

CHAPTER III

PUBLIC OPINION AND GOVERNMENT

§ 1. Early Stages

TAXATION and other accompaniments of a war policy played an outstanding part in the early relations of constituents and members; and they were also productive of the first symptoms of the effective operation of public opinion. This is very natural: the type of citizen whose political interests are not primarily, or at any rate closely, concerned with his purse and his immediate convenience has yet to be discovered.

At the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the popular feeling against the high scale of taxation and, in particular, against the 'enormous abuse of monopolies' expressed itself in an unmistakable way; but general interest, even in a matter so intimately affecting domestic politics, was regarded by those in authority as inappropriate. Robert Cecil complained in the House of Commons that 'parliament matters are ordinary talk in the streets!'¹ Elizabeth, however, seems to have had some regard for popular prejudices when she decided to adopt a conciliatory attitude respecting monopolies.

It is very easy to be misled into exaggerating the activity of public opinion at this stage. An eighteenth-century periodical, Common Sense,² had some remarks on the influence of public opinion in the time of Elizabeth, which illustrate the distorted impressions that were then current regarding those palmy days.

'Queen Elizabeth's Ministers,' it was said, 'before any new measure was taken, used to feel the People's pulse upon it, by causing a report to be spread, that such a thing was in agitation. If they found it well received, it was put in execution; if not, it was dropt. It was by these honest and laudable wiles that she grew so popular while she lived, and her memory has been so revered ever since.'

A student of the period would, it seems, be hard put to it to discover much evidence in support of this happy phase in politics.

¹ Hayward Townshend (Heywood Townsend), Historical Collections, p. 251.

² 3 July 1728.

The people's interests took a fresh turn during the early Stuart period. The sublime disregard shown by Charles I, not only of his subjects' liberties, but also of their growing concern with public affairs, acted as a strong stimulus to a more intensified and enlightened public opinion. The struggle between King and Parliament on matters of prerogative which affected the rights of the people served to sharpen their powers of criticism and political insight. But the views of Charles I regarding the people's place in relation to government were inflexible. His speech on the scaffold, in which he asserted his respect for the people's liberty and freedom and, in the same breath, denied to them any 'share in government', proved him to be pitifully steadfast in his doctrinaire attitude.

It cannot be said that public opinion gained in efficacy during the period of the Commonwealth, though its subsequent development must to some extent be attributed to a reaction against Cromwell's autocracy, which certainly helped to prevent a repetition of the use of Parliament in wanton opposition to popular convictions.

Immediately after the Restoration public opinion exhibited some signs of returning vitality; and the evident and widespread desire for the disbandment of the army was, in the main, satisfied. Charles II's endeavours to rule without Parliament did not enable him to neglect the popular attitude towards such subjects as concessions to Roman Catholics. But he had no real sympathy with the people's political interests; and it must have been mortifying to him that his quarrel with Shaftesbury led to the latter's exploitation of the people as a power in politics by various novel devices.¹

Soon after his dismissal Shaftesbury, in one of his political tracts,² gave an exaggerated picture of the people's capacity in regard to matters of government.

'You have,' he observed, 'in our English government the House of Commons affording the sense, the mind, the information, the complaints, the grievances, and the desires of all those people for whom they serve, throughout the whole nation. The people are thus secure, no laws can be made, no money given, but what themselves, though at home, fully consent and agree to.'

This is a typical instance of the unreliability of passages dealing with the distribution of power in the State, which have been included in political tracts for the purpose of securing party ends. Bolingbroke, some few years later, wrote of the days of Charles II as more enlightened than the period of his mournful exclusion from politics. In the former period, he said, the character of Parliament was determined by the disposition of the people, and the actions of Parliament were always in consonance with 'the declared sense of the nation'.¹ But Bolingbroke, the disappointed man, had good reason for posing as laudator temporis acti.

¹ Cf. p. 15 above and p. 74 below.

² Two Seasonable Discourses concerning the present Parliament, 1675.

Signs of the growth of the efficacy of public opinion were not regarded with complacency by the Ministries of Charles II. Immediately after the Restoration statutes were passed to prohibit tumultuous petitioning, and to disqualify persons who incited the people to hatred or dislike of the person of His Majesty or the established government.² The press became subject to a rigorous regulation and censorship. Later in the reign, a succession of proclamations were issued with the object of curbing free discussion of politics.³ A proclamation of 1672 declared that 'men have assumed to themselves a liberty, not onely in coffee-houses, but in other places and meetings, both public and private, to censure and defame the proceedings of State, by speaking evil of things they understand not, and endeavouring to create and nourish an universal jealousy and dissatisfaction in the minds of all His Majesties good subjects'.

The publication of false news and the intermeddling with 'the affairs of State and government' were sternly prohibited. A similar proclamation appeared in 1674. And, in 1675, coffee-houses were suppressed by proclamation, because they were regarded as hot-beds of political unrest. It was stated in the proclamation that, as a result of meetings in coffee-houses, 'divers false, malicious and scandalous reports are devised and spread abroad, to the defamation of His Majesties Government, and to the disturbance of the peace and quiet of the realm'.

The neglect of popular aspirations in the sphere of politics by Charles II and James II did not sever the attachment of the people to the Stuart dynasty. In so far as it is possible to gauge the forces of public opinion, there is no reasonable doubt that, if a plebiscite had been taken in 1688 on the question of the substitution of William for James, the majority would have voted against the deposition of the latter. The Revolution was, as is often explained, not democratic; it was not the expression of public opinion; its drift was in the direction of a replacement of the absolutism of a king by a 'Venetian oligarchy' supported by the aristocrats. But the new régime of 1688 could hardly afford to neglect the obvious requirement of the mass of the people for a reasonable amount of freedom. The abolition of the unpopular hearth-tax in the first year of the Revolution must have been designed to conciliate the public; the Bill of Rights preserved the people's right of petitioning; and the press became emancipated from its censorship in 1695.

¹ Dissertation upon Parties, Letter 4.

² 13 Chas. II, c. 5; 13 Chas. II, c. 1, s. 2.

³ References to these proclamations may be found in A Bibliography of Royal Proclamations of the Tudor and Stuart Sovereigns (Oxford 1910), vol. i.

The turmoils of the years that followed gave public opinion full scope; and its exercise must have been effective in the reigns of William III and Queen Anne, since politicians began to find it worth their while to employ it in support of their designs. Harley was one of the first to realize the advantages of engaging the people on his side, and for this purpose he attached to his interest pamphleteers, like Swift and Defoe. It was becoming important, if not to instruct, at least to nurse and court public opinion. Ministers could easily realize this at a time when their identification with the Government was becoming more obvious and when the Sovereign's position was growing more detached. Walpole, in his early stages as a party leader, himself wrote political pamphlets, the first of which appeared in 1710, the year in which Swift effectively managed The Examiner. And there was a sudden increase in the issue of political periodicals in the reign of Queen Anne. Papers like The Observer, edited by Tutchin, and Defoe's Review, biased though they were, doubtless helped to spread interest in political doings.¹

As the pamphleteers became bolder, so the Ministry, towards the end of the reign of Queen Anne, proved itself indisposed to suffer free criticism. The press was subjected to a serious handicap by reason of the imposition of the newspaper stamp-duty, a duty which was later increased in amount and which was not removed, as will be noticed,² until 1855. In 1712 the majority in the House of Commons was so exasperated at the publication of a pamphlet reflecting on the proceedings of the House, that it resolved 'that the great liberty taken in printing and publishing scandalous and impious libels creates divisions among her Majesty's subjects, tends to the disturbance of the public peace, is highly prejudicial to her Majesty's Government, and is occasioned for want of due regulating the Press'.¹ But, instead of passing a statute to this end, it was thought that 'a more effectual way' would be to impose a duty on all newspapers and pamphlets. This duty was accordingly imposed by a section² included in a long statute concerned with duties on soap, silks, calicoes, &c. In consequence, the sale of pamphlets and periodicals was adversely affected.

¹ After 1712 the distinction between newspapers proper and political periodicals was less marked than before.

² See p. 64 below.

As the century progressed, however, Ministers did not neglect to pay attention to the support of a Government press to combat the political tracts and periodicals of the Opposition. Walpole, when at the head of the Ministry, was active in this respect. He himself continued to compose political tracts. He wrote one, for instance, in defence of the Excise Scheme.³ Government money was freely spent in subsidizing The Free Briton.⁴ Later in the century Lord North used the False Alarm to bolster up the Ministerial policy; and even the autocratic tendencies of George III did not prevent his seeing the importance of securing the support of public opinion. He employed pamphleteers, like John Shebbeare and James Macpherson, to popularize a defence of the justice of the war with America.

But the proportion of the population touched by these methods cannot have been large. In Queen Anne's reign an official estimate of the circulation of all the principal newspapers was only forty-four thousand.⁵ The circulation of the best-known political periodical of its day, The Craftsman, never seems to have risen above ten thousand. It must be remembered, however, that every copy was probably read by many persons.

Very little encouragement was given to the exercise of public opinion by the spread of authentic information regarding the course of politics. The official publication of 'votes', that is to say the determinations reached in proceedings in

¹ 4 Chandler's Debates, pp. 296, 297, 300.

² 10 Anne, c. 19, s. 101.

³ A letter from a member of Parliament to his Friend in the Country concerning the Duties on Wine and Tobacco (1733).

⁴ Calendar of Treasury Books and Papers, 1731-4, p. 581 and passim.

⁵ Calendar of Treasury Papers, 1702-14, p. 235.

Parliament, was to a limited extent in vogue between 1641 and 1681; but it was only in the latter year that a general resolution was passed authorizing their publication. The comment of Sir Leoline Jenkins on the occasion of this resolution expressed what must have been the attitude of other members besides himself for some years to come. 'Consider', he said, 'the gravity of this assembly. There is no great assembly in Christendom that does it [publishes "votes"]'. It is against the gravity of this assembly, and it is a sort of appeal to the people.' On the other hand, those in favour of publication argued that such a course 'is like true Englishmen, who are not ashamed of what they do'; and that it was 'not natural, nor rational, that the people who sent us hither should not be informed of our actions'.¹

The objection to publishing information on the ground that it might imply an 'appeal to the people' recurred in succeeding years. There was some dissension between the two Houses of Parliament in the session of 1702-3 respecting public accounts and respecting the Occasional Conformity Bill. The Commons adopted a motion that the votes of the House should not be printed; and signs of disapproval were shown in the country. The Lords, on the other hand, made a bid for popularity and ordered their proceedings to be printed forthwith. Whereupon the Commons, not to be outdone, resolved to publish their proceedings likewise. Some of the members of the House of Lords entered a formal protest against publication, in which they asserted that the publication of proceedings would amount to 'an appealing to the people', and would imply that the people had a right to exercise judgement over Parliament.²

A distinction must be drawn between the publication of 'votes' and the publication of debates in Parliament. Although very summary reports or outlines of proceedings had been published during the Commonwealth period, under the title of The Diurnall or The Heads of all the Proceedings in Parliament and similar titles, all reporting was forbidden at the Restoration; and, for some years, it was only by means of occasional illicit news-letters that the substance of the debates in Parliament could be known to the outer world. Publication of debates was declared a breach of privilege in 1722; and the subject was again discussed in 1738, when the protest made by Pulteney included the same arguments as those which have just been quoted. He objected to a practice which would, as he alleged, involve appeals to the people regarding matters discussed in Parliament. In his contention publication of debates would have made members accountable 'without doors' for what they said within the House. Walpole and others based their opposition to publication chiefly on the alleged misleading character of the reports which usually appeared. Sir William Wyndham, on the other hand, said that a consideration which weighed heavily with him was the 'prejudice which the public will think they sustain, by being deprived of all knowledge of what passes in this House, otherwise than by the printed votes, which are very lame and imperfect'. He went farther, and suggested that the people might have a right to know somewhat more of the proceedings of the House than what appeared upon the votes. Publication of reports of debates was, however, declared 'a high indignity to and a notorious breach of the privilege of this House', which would proceed 'with the utmost severity against offenders'.¹

¹ 4 Parl. Hist. 1306 ff.; Report of the Select Committee on the Publication of Printed Papers, 1837.

² 6 Parl. Hist. 135; The History of the Reign of Queen Anne digested into Annals, Year the First (Boyer), p. 222; Protests of the Lords from 1624 to 1874 (ed. J. E. T. Rogers), vol. i, p. 168.

The people were not so to be kept in the dark respecting the doings of Parliament. Imperfect reports of debates had appeared spasmodically in the seventeenth century² and with some regularity in Boyer's Political State of Great Britain, a publication which began in 1711. The Gentleman's Magazine, in 1731, and the London Magazine, soon after, published fairly full reports. The speakers were for some years given disguised names; but their identity was obvious to every one. After the great quarrel over the privilege of the House of Commons in 1771 no further trouble was taken to maintain pseudonyms; and the breach of privilege was committed with impunity.

§ 2. Walpole and the Pelhams

The eighteenth century did not progress very far before Ministers discovered that information on matters of vital interest to the people travelled fast enough to prevent their acting in complete opposition to public opinion. When the people's pockets were affected or their patriotism aroused, they were particularly ready to make their wishes understood.¹

¹ 10 Parl. Hist. 800-12.

² The substance of debates on particular subjects was reproduced in tracts in 1681, and individual speeches were published before that date.

Walpole's attention to any such symptoms was, it may be supposed, largely attributable to expediency. Lecky said that his withdrawal of Wood's halfpence, when they had excited the opposition of the Irish people, and his abandonment of the project of excise are examples of his constant respect for the wishes of the people. His leading principle was undoubtedly the avoidance of friction and dissension. But it is at least doubtful whether the wishes of the people were a primary factor, as is sometimes assumed, in his decision to withdraw his famous Excise Scheme in 1733.²

The violent antagonism which the Scheme aroused was to a large degree due to the intrigues of Walpole's enemies. They did not, it seems, imagine that the opinions of the public alone would deter Walpole from proceeding with his proposals; but they hoped that a sufficient number of his supporters in the House of Commons could be induced to desert him through fear of defeat at the general election which was due in the following year. In order to work upon the susceptibilities of members whose allegiance was insecure, they organized a campaign with the object of inspiring the public with apprehensions at the financial mischiefs which the Scheme would involve. And the divisions in the House, which pointed to the probability of progressive decreases in and even the disappearance of the majority of the Government, must have suggested that their hopes might well be realized.

In so far as the question of intimidation is concerned, Walpole could not fail to realize the risks of maltreatment by the crowd, which hustled and threatened him on more than one occasion during the period of the debates on the subject. But he was far from suffering from cowardly instincts; and it is not likely that direct threats of violence had much effect on him.³ The possibility of his being actuated in his decision by the demonstrations of the London mob at the time when the Scheme was first introduced in Parliament may be discounted by reading his remarks in his speech on 14 March 1733. Sir William Wyndham had expressed surprise that the Scheme had been introduced 'so much to the dislike and dissatisfaction of the people in general' and had characterized the proposal, after 'so many remonstrances against it', as 'most audacious' and 'in a manner flying in the face of the whole people of England'. Walpole's reply to these denunciations is of importance in proving his knowledge of the lack of spontaneity in the demonstrations against the Scheme, especially those in London.

¹ The recurrent apathy of the people towards political issues during the eighteenth century is mentioned on pp. 183-4 below.

² Cf. 42 E.H.R., pp. 34 ff., an article by Raymond Turner.

³ It is true that, in Feb. 1732, Walpole asserted, during a debate on the question of the revival of the Salt Tax, that, 'if there were any danger that the reviving of this tax would occasion murmuring among the people, I should be as much against it as any man in this House'; 8 Parl. Hist. 969. But Walpole must have realized, like any other statesman, that it is sometimes necessary to carry through financial measures which are not popular, in the interest of the nation.

'As to these clamours', he said, 'which have been raised without doors, and which are now so much insisted upon, it is very well known by whom and by what methods they were raised, and it is no difficult matter to guess with what views; but I am very far from taking them to be the sense of the nation, or believing that the sentiments of the generality of the people were thereby expressed.'¹

And he informed the House that he was well aware of the means by which the demonstrators had been induced to collect at Westminster.

As regards the demonstrations emanating from the provinces, most of these seem to have been launched before the speech, of which an extract has just been quoted, was made. It is unlikely that there were a sufficient number of additional protests from the country, between the time of this speech and the time of the decision to withdraw the Scheme, materially to change Walpole's opinion regarding their weight. The extent of the volume of protest from the provinces may be judged from one or two tracts composed of letters of request to members of Parliament from constituencies, trading bodies, and others. It is clear that the Opposition used every effort to collect all possible evidence of antagonism to the Scheme. The tract with the largest number of protests² was evidently published before the above-quoted speech was made. The list of constituencies is not imposing. Only one county is mentioned; and only some two dozen other constituencies seem to have sent official requests to their members to oppose the Scheme. Similar tracts, published in 1741, contain much more weighty lists of constituencies, including many counties. Still, it must be remembered that the City of London protested officially; and this protest may well have had some influence on Walpole's decision.

¹ 8 Parl. Hist. 1305-6.

² Excise: Being a Collection of Letters &c. containing the Sentiments and Instructions of the Merchants, Traders, Gentry and Inhabitants of the principal Cities, Counties, and Boroughs &c. (1733). Cf. A Collection of Letters from several Counties, Cities and Boroughs containing Instructions to their Representatives in Parliament, &c (1733).

There are, however, one or two circumstances which lend some support to the view that Walpole was affected by the popular agitation to a greater extent than by the unpromising situation in the House of Commons; but, when they are examined, they do not appear to be altogether convincing.

After a debate on the question of hearing arguments in support of the petition of the City of London, Walpole only narrowly escaped defeat. He had by that time privately decided to drop the Bill; and he insisted that this decision should not be made public until the hearing of the petition was rejected. The reason given by him for this course was his anxiety not to be 'seeming to yield . . . at the instigation of the City'. If such were thought to be his attitude, there would probably have followed more violent and effective methods of agitation by this powerful body whenever any future legislative project antagonized sections of the people.¹ But the fact that Walpole displayed anxiety to avoid the inference that he was actuated by public opinion does not make it certain that the pressure of public opinion was the main motive for his conduct.

Walpole is recounted by Coxe, his biographer, to have explained to some of his friends that his action was guided by the consideration that, 'in the present inflamed temper of the people, the Act could not be carried into execution without an armed force; and there will be an end of the liberty of England if supplies are to be raised by the sword'.² Doubt has been thrown on the genuineness of this story; but, even if the story is true, it does not follow that the reasons given to a group of supporters were the ones which moved him most. Walpole would naturally refrain, before such an audience, from putting in the forefront lack of support in Parliament as the reason for withdrawal of the Scheme, for, if he had, he might have found some difficulty in recovering his normal majority.

¹ Lord Hervey's Memoirs (ed. Sedgwick), vol. i, pp. 134, 135, 156, 157.

² Coxe took the view that 'dislike of counteracting public opinion' was Walpole's main motive; see Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. i, p. 403.

The speech in which Walpole informed the House of Commons, on 11 April 1733, of the withdrawal of the Scheme is not reported in the Parliamentary History; and Lord Hervey, in his Memoirs, merely describes it as 'very long and artful'.¹ There is, however, an account of it in the diary of the Earl of Egmont,² who stated that Walpole gave three reasons for withdrawing his Scheme,

'first the declension of the majority which shewed itself the first day, being 61, which last night he saw reduced to 17; secondly the clamours raised against it, which though artificially stirred up, yet it was not prudent to press a thing which the nation expressed so general a dislike to, however they were deceived; and thirdly, which was with him of most moment, the apprehensions which many honest and sincere friends of the Government had entertained of danger to his Majesty's person and Government from the disaffection which they supposed this Bill, however mistaken, might create in the abused people's minds, which alone was reason sufficient to justify his parting with the Bill.'

There is no ground for doubting the substantial accuracy of this account; but it may not be necessary to conclude that the second and third reasons carried more weight than the first. Moreover, it is difficult to understand how circumstances had changed sufficiently by the 11th of April to make Walpole believe that the nation had expressed 'so general a dislike' for the Scheme. On the 14th of March he had, as noticed above, informed the House that he was satisfied that the clamours did not represent the sense of the people.

The available evidence, which is not conclusive in one direction or the other, leaves the impression that the withdrawal of the Excise Scheme did not follow mainly as a result of the direct operation of public opinion, but, to a large extent, as a result of indications in the House of Commons which were themselves produced by the action of public opinion, owing to the proximity of the expiration of the period of Parliament and of the general election. The truth seems to be that Walpole changed his plans for the immediate and compelling reason that he found it impossible to carry them in Parliament. Public opinion, in the days when party loyalties were unreliable, affected the action of the Ministry rather as a result of its influence on individual members than by means of a direct influence on the Ministry itself.

¹ Lord Hervey's Memoirs (ed. Sedgwick), vol. i, p. 163, and see, with regard to the Scheme generally, vol. i, pp. 132-78 of this edition.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., Diary of the Earl of Egmont, vol. i, p. 960.

The failure of the Ministry to gauge the latent antipathy towards the Jews, at the time of the passing of the Jews Naturalization Act of 1752, displays an insensitiveness to popular prejudices not to be expected even from eighteenth-century politicians. The Act, harmless enough in itself, was passed some few months before the date at which a general election was due. Again the Opposition adopted the stratagem of raising the alarm. The Act, they said, would have the result of depriving Christians of their religion; and, on such a subject, the people were at that time easily provoked to anger. The merchants of London became alarmed at imaginary commercial advantages which the Jews were to derive from the passing of the measure. It was even suggested that the Jews would be put in a position to oust the nobility and gentry from their estates and property. A popular slogan was: 'No Jews, long beards, nor whiskers!' Fierce opposition sprung up in every corner of the land, and it became plain that even the skill of the Pelhams in the management of elections might fail to overcome the infatuation of the voters.

The Duke of Newcastle was chiefly responsible for the change of policy by which the Act was repealed. 'The pressure of a fomented popular agitation deprived him of his ability to refuse concessions. Chesterfield described him as being 'frightened out of his wits at the groundless and senseless clamour against the Jew Bill'.¹ Newcastle required all the specious explanations he could find to maintain his dignity. The measure, he said, was not a very important one from the point of view of national interest, and, in consequence, he saw no harm in giving way and allowing its repeal. Pitt, who at this stage gave his support to the Newcastle Ministry, likened the Government to an indulgent father and the people to 'a peevish, perverse boy', who insisted 'upon something that was not quite right, but of such a nature as, when granted, could not be attended with any very bad consequence'. The wording of one of the recitals to the repealing Act bears witness to the futility of the proceeding. 'Whereas occasion has been taken . . .', it said, 'to raise discontents, and to disquiet the minds of many of His Majesty's subjects: be it enacted . . . ' It is odd that the Opposition, which had been able to engineer the repeal of the Naturalization Act, was unable, although it objected to the terms of the recital, to insist on its omission.

¹ Chesterfield's Letters (ed. 1845), vol. iv, p. 94.

The repeal of the Jews Naturalization Act may have a rather better claim than the withdrawal of the Excise Scheme to be included among examples of the influence of public opinion on the course of legislation; but it is an unsatisfactory one. The expression of opinion was not spontaneous: it was provoked by unscrupulous and alarmist politicians for their own party purposes at a time when a poor-spirited Ministry was under strong temptation to accede to it. This kind of surrender in the face of party machinations hardly enables a true measure to be taken of the growth of the recognition of the influence of the people.

There were, however, occasions when the people required little or no stimulus from politicians to press for the removal of grievances. Throughout the eighteenth century the interference with proper representation, as a result of the nomination by the King or the Ministry of placemen or pensioners to seats in the House of Commons, raised genuine feelings of indignation among the public. For many years the Ministry was able to flout demands for remedy. But, in the reaction after the fall of Walpole, a Place Bill became law in 1742. Although it was far from satisfying the demands of reformers, it had considerable effect by excluding inferior officers of the Crown; and the achievement, in so far as it can so be described, was one in which the people had an intimate share.

It was not only the passing or the repeal of legislation that became subject to the people's influence. Questions of peace and war and efficient leadership also aroused their interest and became subject to popular pressure. Perhaps the best instance of a declaration of hostilities being attributable to the influence of public opinion is that of the war with Spain, commonly known as the 'War of Jenkins' Ear'.

The trade of Great Britain with the West Indies was, towards the end of Walpole's régime, alleged to be impeded by the interference of the Spaniards, and in particular by their exercise of claims to search and detain British ships. A sense of aggravation among the merchant classes developed into one of indignation among the citizens of the chief ports. In 1737 and 1738 organized expressions of feeling took shape in several petitions for redress by bodies of merchants; and, in the latter year, the Opposition leaders began to realize that the growing agitation might be exploited so as to make the position of Walpole's Ministry untenable. They tried to magnify the grounds for misunderstanding between the two countries with the object of rendering impracticable an adjustment of disputes. Their efforts to inflame the passions of the people were largely successful; and stories of the Spaniards' cruelties and insults to British sailors produced a widespread demand for war.

Walpole, who saw that a war with Spain would be contrary to the best interests of the nation, was able during 1738 to avoid a conflict. But when the terms of the Convention, designed to settle outstanding differences with Spain, were published in February 1739 it was immediately complained that some of the chief grievances were unremoved; and further petitions poured in from the City of London and the merchants of many large ports of England and Scotland.¹ A widely distributed and effective pamphlet² claimed that less than ten thousand out of ten million citizens approved the Convention. There can, of course, have been no means of making any such calculation open to the author, although he had a considerable reputation as a mathematician. It is certain that Walpole was only able to organize a very small number of merchants to present counter-addresses in favour of peace. But it is unlikely that the inland counties and large towns, which were not immediately interested in the West India trade, displayed any extreme anxiety in regard to the situation, unless some account is to be taken of an incipient ardour for imperialistic expansion.

In March 1739 the Government only obtained a majority of 21 (95-74) in the House of Lords and of 28 (260-232) in the House of Commons, when the Convention was discussed. Pitt, making one of his early speeches in this debate, asserted in regard to the Convention that 'the voice of England has condemned it'. Still Walpole made every effort to avoid war. For many months he had stood firm against the pressure of the public outcry; and, in the debate on the Convention, he declared that he was resolved 'to let no popular clamour get the better of what I think is for my country's good'.

¹ Journals of the House of Commons, vol. xxiii, pp. 53-5, 94-5, 247-52, 269-75.

² An Address to the Electors of Great Britain, occasioned by the late Secession (1739) [by Benjamin Robins], p. 4.

Only a few weeks after making this remark, however, Walpole's Ministry decided to declare war. The decision was, according to Coxe, greeted 'with a degree of enthusiasm and joy, which announced the general frenzy of the nation. Bells pealed in all churches in London . . . the stocks rose . . .'¹ Coxe, who naturally regarded the agitation as fomented for sinister reasons, would hardly have wished to exaggerate the effect which the declaration of war produced. And there can be no doubt that, in places like London and Bristol, the enthusiasm for war among the populace was unbounded.

The question, whether or not the war was undertaken as the direct result of the pressure of public opinion, has been a subject of full investigation by historians; and the weighty opinion of Professor Temperley is to the effect that 'the old contention of Burke, that the war was unjust, that it was provoked by Opposition clamour, and was "the fruit of popular desire" appears to be true'. Walpole was undoubtedly affected, as he was in respect of the Excise Scheme, by the dangers of the disappearance of his majority in Parliament; and, if he had been properly supported by his own colleagues, he would probably have taken the same view of the people's influence as he had on other occasions, namely, that it should be regarded as effective indirectly, through the channels of Parliament, and not otherwise.

But there was a new factor which affected Walpole in regard to the Spanish War, namely, the Duke of Newcastle, who was a member of the Ministry. As in the instance of the 'Jews' Bill', so also in 1738 and 1739, Newcastle was palpably afraid of the mob; and Professor Temperley has recognized in him one of the main explanations of the surrender of the Ministry. It is, in his view, impossible to attribute the decision to declare war to a change of attitude in regard to, say, political relations with France, since

'peace appeared to be almost certain until Parliament intervened. Newcastle's deference to Parliament and to public opinion is too obvious; the fateful dispatch of the counter-order coincides too closely with the date of the parliamentary debate on the Convention to prevent any one denying that popular and parliamentary agitation was the main factor in causing the war.'¹

¹ Coxe, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. i, p. 617.

§ 3. The elder Pitt

The observation of Dr. Johnson, to the effect that Walpole was a Minister given by the King to the people and that Pitt was a Minister given by the people to the King, was broadly true.² Pitt's arrival at a position of supremacy marks a further and important stage in the history of public opinion, though, here again, there were other influences at work besides that of the people. Newcastle (at the head of the Government) was seriously alarmed at the possible effect of Pitt's patriotic oratory, and he fully appreciated the risk of his going into opposition and so bringing about the defeat of the Ministry.

By 1755 Pitt had secured the support of the Prince of Wales's party at Leicester House; and there was no more potent ally in a campaign against the Court. In the summer of that year Newcastle made feverish efforts to obtain Pitt's adherence, since it had become obvious that, if Pitt could rally the Opposition with the cry of a mismanaged war, the Ministry might well fall at the opening of Parliament. He had steadily been increasing his hold on popular sympathies; and, as Lord Rosebery said of him in his early parliamentary career,

'although Pitt's actual words reached the people late or not at all, there was an echo which was audible, and made known all through the three kingdoms, that there was within the walls of Parliament an intrepid, unbribed, perhaps incorruptible orator, who feared the face of no man, and who was embodying in fiery words the antipathies and distrusts of the nation.'³

The years 1756 and 1757 saw the triumph of Pitt's ambition and the gratification of the insistence of the people. Widespread apprehension at the disastrous turn in national affairs, the reverses in America, the failure of military efforts on the Continent, the loss of Minorca, and the horrors of the Black Hole of Calcutta, which was made plain in political tracts and satires and in other ways, proved that salvation was, in the view of the nation, only to be found in a vigorous Ministry with Pitt at its head.

¹ Royal Historical Society Transactions, 3rd series, 1909, vol. iii, pp. 227-30, 234-5.

² Dr. Johnson qualified his remark regarding Pitt by adding the words 'as an adjunct'.

³ Lord Rosebery, Chatham, His Early Life and Connections, p. 191.

Newcastle was not only faced with clamour in the country; he suffered a serious blow in the desertion, at the moment of crisis, of both Fox and Murray. His majority was endangered; and he decided that resignation was the only possible course. After the King had indulged in some futile negotiations in search of an alternative, Pitt reached the dominant position which he justly regarded as his due. His appointment, as Secretary of State, was greeted with universal signs of approbation. The Monitor, a periodical which had recently been launched with the object of opposing and exposing Court intrigue, commented on the position more boldly than most of the periodicals of the time.

'The good people of England', it said, 'have an undoubted right to the services of the brightest statesmen: therefore His Majesty has dismissed those servants, who had neither abilities to advise, nor resolution to execute the necessary measures for the honour and safety of his Crown and dominions; and has committed the care of the nation to men, who, in his greatest wisdom are accounted the most able to add splendour and dignity to our councils at home, and to give a check to the machinations of our enemies abroad; as soon as time and opportunity shall permit.'¹

Political versifiers were unable to restrain their glee at Pitt's appointment; and many ballads appeared showing that the masses understood what Pitt's appointment meant for them. A stanza of one of these ballads, entitled The Ministry Changed or The Clean Contrary Way, ran as follows:

Each dire oppression now shall cease
 'neath which the people groaning lay.
 Each galling grievance be redressed—
 The clean contrary way.

Newcastle had none of Walpole's intrepidity. He was naturally of a nervous temperament. Horace Walpole, whose hatred for Newcastle was extreme, remarked that 'fear, a ridiculous fear was predominant in him';² and, in spite of the obvious prejudice, it is easy to believe it. He was even incapable of going to bed in a room which had no other occupant than himself. It may well be, therefore, that he was to some extent influenced by a feeling that public opinion might take an ugly shape. Although his retirement cannot be described as having been precipitated by fear of force, that element probably played a part in his decision. Lampoons and ballads on him were hung at street corners, and he was pelted by the mob. A favourite ballad-song of 1756 had the refrain: 'To the block with Newcastle and yard-arm with Byng.'¹ It was Pitt himself who, on a later occasion, told Newcastle that they would not be safe in the streets if they opposed public opinion.

¹ The Monitor, 27 Nov. 1756.

² Memoirs of the Reign of George II (ed. Holland), vol. i, p. 166.

Although Newcastle was influenced by popular demonstrations, his eye was, it may be suspected, steadily directed on his majority in the House of Commons. The loosely attached members of the House might, as on other occasions in the eighteenth century, suddenly decide that their interests lay with politicians outside the Ministry. If a group of them were to desert Newcastle by reason of their anxiety to conciliate their patriotic electors, the Ministerial majority would disappear. It is likely, then, that the influence of the people on the change of Ministers was indirect as well as direct.

In 1757, at the time of Pitt's dismissal and prior to his re-appointment to office in the same year, popular periodicals gave expression to the general eagerness that he should remain in control of the nation's fortunes. The *London Evening Post*² vindicated the people's right to influence the choice of Ministers. *The Monitor*³ published a quaint sketch of the management of the ship of State, wherein the Captain in an emergency called upon 'Will' to take the helm; and 'Will' was described as putting the ship to rights. It was then disclosed that 'the Captain loves the old clan and does not like Will . . . The old clan are desperate and are resolved, rather than fail, to toss him overboard.' In various ways, the people displayed their indignation at the intrigue, which led to the removal from office of the one man who had proved himself capable of averting disaster.

Pitt's difficulties in managing Parliament were as great, if not greater, than those of Newcastle. Horace Walpole wrote, regarding Pitt's first few months of office in 1756, that he was so little provided with interest in boroughs that the new Ministry was 'almost an administration out of Parliament'.⁴

¹ Grenville Papers, vol. i, p. 173; Brit. Mus. 1876. f. 1 (155).

² Passim. See especially Apr. 1757.

³ 9 Apr. 1757 and 27 Aug. 1757.

⁴ Horace Walpole's Letters (ed. Toynbee), vol. iv, p. 16; Horace Walpole, Memoirs of the Reign of George II (ed. Holland), vol. ii, p. 260.

Pitt fully realized his insecurity, in attempting to rely on public opinion to counterbalance the absence of a solid following in the House of Commons; and, in his second spell of office, on returning to power after a brief and fruitless effort on the part of the King to keep himself free of his demagogic Minister, he found that he would require the adherence of Newcastle's retinue as well as the support of the people in order to enable him to maintain his position. But he lost no opportunity of taking the people into his confidence, and of appealing directly to their patriotic instincts. He used, among other means, the King's Speech as a medium, and spoke of 'relying with pleasure on the spirit and zeal of my people', and of confidence in the bravery of the nation. In 1756 he remarked to the Duke of Devonshire, the nominal head of his first Ministry, in regard to the terms of the Speech on the opening of Parliament: 'I have drawn it captivating to the people'; and he reckoned that the Speech would 'go over the whole kingdom' and have the effect of spreading satisfaction.¹ One of his principles seems to have been that 'the public must be humoured'.² Nevertheless there had never before been a Minister who had thus affected to take the governed into partnership with the Government.

When he resigned, in 1761, on a disagreement with his colleagues regarding the necessity of a war with Spain, Pitt told them in Cabinet Council that he had been 'called to the Ministry by the voice of the people', a remark which drew from Newcastle a curious comment: 'When he talks of being responsible to the people he talks the language of the House of Commons and forgets that at this Board he is only responsible to the King.'³ By 'the language of the House of Commons' he presumably meant the language that Pitt had been accustomed to use in that House to the discomfiture of those, like Newcastle, who feared any intrusion of the people into the political arena.

On the occasion of Pitt's admission to office, in contrast, for instance, to the agitation about the Excise Scheme, public opinion acted with spontaneity. Instigation by an organized Opposition was not a factor in the undertaking, the object of which was eminently suited to the people's capacity. They were not in the least qualified to pronounce upon intricate questions of finance, such as were involved in the Excise Scheme. But, on a matter of choosing a vigorous and conscientious statesman in a national emergency, they were able to form an opinion and, as it proved, to enforce it.

¹ MS. Letter, 15 Nov. 1756, quoted in Torrens, History of Cabinets, vol. ii, p. 343. It seems that the King refused Pitt's first draft, see C. P. Yorke, Life of Hardwicke, vol. ii, p. 373. He complained of its length and exclaimed 'stuff and nonsense' at some of its expressions; B. Williams, Life of Pitt, vol. i, p. 287.

² Hist. MSS. Comm. Report on MSS. of Mrs. Stopford-Sackville, vol. i, p. 304, Lord George Sackville to Prince Ferdinand, 23 Feb. 1759.

³ Annual Register, 1761, Part I, pp. 43-4.

It has been seen that, in three notable instances of change of policy, the influence of public opinion began to make itself felt, namely, the instances of the War with Spain in 1739, the repeal of the 'Jews' Act', and the inclusion of Pitt in the Ministry. In each of these incidents a large part was played by the timidity of Newcastle. It is likely that, if there had stood in his place a statesman of even average firmness of character, the exploitation of the people, in the first two instances, would never have had a chance of success, and that, if a reasonably competent Minister had been in charge in 1756, the people would never have had so early an opportunity of proving that their influence over the choice of Ministers was something which had to be taken into account.

Shortly after the Earl of Chatham had recovered from his long period of infirmity, he was able to reappear in the House of Lords in January 1770, and to make two memorable speeches on the state of the nation, and, in particular, on the popular rights of election. The controversies surrounding the name of Wilkes had raised such loud and persistent clamour among the people that numerous addresses were presented censuring the attitude of the House of Commons. In the earlier speech, he emphasized the claim of public opinion to be heard; and he asked which were the more deserving of respect, the people's representatives or 'the collective body of the people'. He gave his answer in favour of the latter. In the second speech, he proposed as a cure for the discrepancy between the attitude of the people and that of their representatives, not the supremacy of public opinion by the subordination of the House of Commons, but reform of the legislature. 'The Constitution', he observed, 'intended that there should be a permanent relation between the constituent and representative body of the people. Will any man affirm that, as the House of Commons is now formed, that relation is in any degree preserved?' He added, however, that it was necessary to be cautious and not to resort to violent expedients. He advised 'gentler remedies', and he suggested that, by an increase in the number of the county members, the House of Commons could more truly reflect the opinion of the people than it did. In this way he imagined that the permanent relation would be maintained. But a mere increase in the number of county members and members of other large constituencies would have gone but a short way towards rectifying the evils he condemned.

The Earl of Chatham, in the first of these two speeches, regarded the effective exercise of public opinion as a compensation for the imperfections of a narrow representation; a few days afterwards, he prescribed a reform in the representation as the best method of compensation for defects in the exercise of public opinion. The two separate needs, respect for public opinion and a reform in the representation, were, in the course of these debates, as upon other occasions in the later eighteenth century, the subject of some confusion.

§ 4. Burke

Every student of Burke, who is not altogether captivated by his oratorical spell, has spent some effort in trying to reconcile his various interpretations of the people's liberties. His Thoughts on the Present Discontents was written at the beginning of 1770, about the time of the delivery of the two speeches of Chatham of which mention has just been made. Its object was to find a remedy for the abuses of faction, intrigue, and maladministration. His chief palliatives were the publication of parliamentary proceedings, so as to increase the capacity of the people to take an effective interest in politics, and the substitution of the true principles of party for the machinations of mere cliques, two subjects which are discussed elsewhere in this book. 'The virtue, spirit, and essence of a house of commons', he said, 'consist in its being the express image of the feelings of the nation.'¹

By March 1770, however, before this pamphlet had left the printers, the City of London had prepared a remonstrance on the ungracious answer to a petition regarding the rejection of Wilkes, after his having been returned as a member for the fourth time by the electors of Middlesex. Burke's remarks in a debate in the House of Commons on this remonstrance are so markedly opposed to the principles advanced in his Discontents that the inconsistency can only be explained by his resentment at the City alleging that the House of Commons had ceased to be representative. He poured scorn on the notion that the City should regard some agreement between the House of Commons and the people as inherent in representation.

¹ He expressed, however, his contempt for the politics of the uninstructed. He characterized 'the opinion of the meer vulgar' as 'a miserable rule even with regard to themselves, on account of their violence and instability'.

'Let the people of the City of London,' he is reported as saying, 'who are not so well instructed as we are in the principles of law, proceed by a sort of rough, vulgar, common sense of their own upon this question. To make the parliament the only representatives of the people they think there should be some agreement between it and the people; they think there should be some attention paid to their interests. We, Sir, know that this House is just as much the representatives of the people, as if we had the greatest connexion with their opinions: but we know this, because we are enlarged in our opinions; while they are confined.'¹

Ten years later Burke may be found, in carefully prepared statements on constitutional relations, repeating his liberal sentiments. In his Letter to the Chairman of the Bucks Meeting he remarked: 'It would be dreadful indeed if there were any power in the nation capable of resisting its unanimous desire, or even the desire of any great and decided majority of the people.' In the same year he exhibited equal fervour, during his Speech on the Duration of Parliaments: 'To govern according to the sense and agreeably to the interests of the people, is a great and glorious object of government.' But he qualified these words by saying that, although the people could judge in general whether a Ministry had done its work honestly and well, 'as to the detail of particular measures, or to any general schemes of policy, they have neither enough of speculation in the closet nor of experience in business to decide upon it'.

When the younger Pitt had, in 1784, adduced, with some justification, the support of the people as a ground for the dissolution of Parliament, which had the result of removing from Burke the hopes of political advancement, Burke seems to have been tempted to change his front. (As Lord Morley said of him, he 'changed his front, but never his ground'.) He introduced an elaborate motion in a speech which was listened to by the House with ill-disguised impatience. After admitting that the sense of the people, however erroneous, must govern the legislature, he contended that it was sometimes the duty of the better informed and more enlightened part of the community to resist the sense of the people, when it appeared that the people were deceived or misled.

¹ Cavendish Debates, vol. i, p. 544. The report is more likely to be accurate than most reports of the period.

In reviewing Burke's attitude it is easy, as has been suggested, to seize upon apparent inconsistencies. Cartwright, the Radical, charged him with talking of the people's liberties, and at the same time explaining away their rights. But it must be remembered that, although he had a steady respect for the aspirations of the people, he never pretended to a high appreciation of their political capacity.

§ 5. Fox and Pitt the Younger

There were other prominent politicians besides Burke who adopted the view that the representation of the people by Parliament was absolute and plenary. At the opening of his parliamentary career, Charles Fox employed the argument that the only proper method of ascertaining the opinion of the people was by consulting the House of Commons. When dealing with the question whether the people at large were better judges of the public welfare than the House of Commons, he described the latter as the only revealers of the national mind, the only judges of what ought to be the sentiments of the Kingdom. There were many laws which were highly necessary to the public welfare which did not obtain popular approbation; and he declared, with youthful sublimity: 'I pay no regard whatever to the voice of the people: it is our duty to do what is proper, without considering what may be agreeable: their business is to chuse us; it is ours to act constitutionally, and to maintain the independency of Parliament.'¹ As a result of this speech, Fox was attacked by a mob, as he drove down to the House, and was rolled in the mud.

This phase soon passed; and Fox, when taxed, in 1780, with having maintained that the voice of the people was only to be collected in the House of Commons, excused himself for allowing expressions to drop which were 'loose and undefined' on the ground that he was only twenty-one years of age at the time.² It was still his view, he remarked, that the vote of the House of Commons was 'the most practicable and expeditious means of declaring the sense of the people'; and he concluded his explanation, with considerable ingenuity, by pledging himself to the proposition that 'when the representative body did not speak the sense of the constituent, the voice of the latter was constitutional and conclusive'. But how is it to be known that Parliament does not speak the opinion of the people? This is a question upon which Fox's speech threw no light and which has given politicians, and will give them, scope for indefinite disputation. No arguments have been more frequently and more speciously employed than those which maintain the favour or disfavour of the people.

¹ 16 Parl. Hist. 1264; 17 Parl. Hist. 149.

² 21 Parl. Hist. 936.

In the early months of 1784, when he was using every effort to dislodge the newly appointed and popularly supported Pitt from office, Fox again found it impossible not to qualify his recognition of the people's powers. While he admitted that the voice of the people should meet with attention, he claimed that it was not to be blindly followed, since the people, though they might be allowed to inflict small injuries on themselves, could not be allowed to condemn themselves to their own destruction.¹ Fox was forced by Pitt's well-timed dissolution of March 1784 to pay court to his constituency at Westminster, where he explained to his electors in non-committal terms, through his election address, that 'to secure to the people of this country the weight which belongs to them in the scale of the Constitution, has ever been the principle of my political conduct'.

Under Pitt's régime a closer attention was paid to the movements of public opinion. Pitt had, in 1791, entered upon preparations for hostilities against Russia. But, so strongly marked was the dislike of this policy shown by the people at large, he decided to relinquish his plan and to countermand the orders for the dispatch of the fleet, though he possessed what had proved for some years to be a safe majority in the House of Commons. This example of a sudden change of policy displayed the influence of the people working rather more in modern fashion than in the examples which have been cited to illustrate the earlier part of the eighteenth century. At the time of the dropping of the Excise Scheme, for instance, public opinion operated to a large extent indirectly, by diminishing a ministerial majority and so forcing the hand of the Minister. In the instance of Pitt and the armament against Russia, the chance of a defeat of the Government was more remote. Attention was probably paid as much to the opinion in the country as to the chances of successful opposition in Parliament.

¹ 24 Parl. Hist. 647-8.

Pitt, however, seems to have regarded a defeat in the House of Commons as a possibility. He wrote a letter to the Minister at the Court of Berlin, in which he mentioned 'the effect which opinion and public impression' had in England, and remarked that the first discussions of the policy proved that the prospect of 'obtaining a support sufficient to carry this line through with vigour and effect was absolutely desperate'. If, he said, his plan had been pressed, it would either have not been carried or would have been approved 'by so weak a division as would nearly amount to defeat'.¹

This letter was written with a view to mollifying the King of Prussia, an object which was necessary owing to Pitt's sudden withdrawal from an attitude of aggression to Russia. It is possible, therefore, that he expressed himself rather more vigorously regarding the weakness of his position in the House of Commons than he would have done if he had been writing a private memorandum.

Fox made a debate in the House in 1792, regarding the armament against Russia, the occasion for a full explanation of his matured views on the legitimate sphere of the operation of public opinion. A passage in his speech expresses an attitude which is as sensible to-day as it must have seemed at the time the speech was delivered.

'It is certainly right and prudent', he said, 'to consult the public opinion; it is frequently wise to attend even to public prejudices on subjects of such infinite importance, as whether they are to have war or peace. But if, in the capacity of a servant of the Crown, I were to see, or strongly to imagine that I saw, any measures going forward that threatened the peace or prosperity of the country, and if the emergency was so pressing as to demand the sudden adoption of a decisive course to avert the mischief, I should not hesitate one moment to act on my own opinion. If the public opinion did not happen to square with mine; if, after pointing out to them the danger, they did not see it in the same light with me, or if they conceived that another remedy was preferable to mine, I should consider it as my due to my King, due to my Country, due to my honour, to retire, that they might pursue the plan which they thought better, by a fit instrument, that is, by a man who thought with them. Such would be my conduct on any great subject where conscientiously I could not surrender my opinion. If the case was doubtful, or the emergency not so pressing, I should be ready, perhaps, to surrender my opinion to that of the public; but one thing is most clear in such an event as this, namely, that I ought to give the public the means of forming an opinion.¹

¹ Stanhope, Life of Pitt (ed. 1861), vol. ii, pp. 115-18.

These sentiments have a genuinely democratic ring about them which was in advance of the times. But, acceptable as Fox's general views may be nowadays, they are coloured to some extent by the limitation of their period. Since the important change in the constitutional position, which began with the passing of the great Reform Bill, had not yet taken place, Fox, in dealing with the various circumstances which might lead a Minister to retire or to remain in office, could not envisage an appeal to the people at a general election with the object of settling whether one policy or another should be adopted. At the time of Fox and the younger Pitt, public opinion reached as wide an efficacy as it could before new social problems and new constitutional developments of the nineteenth century led to the enlargement of the methods of its operation and, on occasion, rendered it definitely ascertainable by means of the process of counting heads.²

§ 6. Modern times

Perhaps the most remarkable steps in the development of the influence of public opinion during the last century are observable in connexion with the passing of the early measures of social legislation. These steps were largely the outcome of several new factors, of changes in industrial conditions and in notions regarding the proper sphere of State activities, and of progress in humanitarian ideas. The influence of public opinion on social legislation may, therefore, be justifiably selected for special notice before remarks are made regarding the various circumstances which enabled the people to take a more instructed interest than previously in public affairs.

¹ 29 Parl. Hist. 974.

² It should be added that there were other instances, besides that of the armament against Russia, in which Pitt altered his policy in pursuance of the dictates of opinion 'out of doors'. He showed himself particularly responsive to the people's views in regard to taxation; and, on one or two occasions, he deemed it proper to withdraw proposals for imposts which proved to be unpopular. Examples are given in Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. v, p. 302; and see Hist. MSS. Comm., Report on MSS. of Mrs. Stopford-Sackville, vol. i, p. 48, Viscount Sackville to his son Charles, 17 June 1785.

The events leading up to the enactment of the first statutes for the amelioration of the conditions in factories and mines and of the state of sanitation in towns provide the best illustrations of the ways in which the new factors operated.¹

It was during the last two or three decades of the eighteenth century that members of the labouring classes began to be engaged in factories for the purpose of tending machinery; and, before the end of that century, a few philanthropically minded persons evinced an interest in the question of the improvement of industrial conditions. Humanitarianism and social problems began to attract attention. A select number of master-spinners and factory-owners expressed their dissatisfaction at the employment of young children and at the number of hours worked by young persons. Early in the nineteenth century Robert Owen, the best known of the philanthropist mill-owners, after having regulated the conditions of work in his own mills on enlightened and humane principles, approached the Ministry with the object of securing the application of similar regulations to all the chief classes of factories. After long negotiation, a Bill of limited scope was passed in 1819, the chief merit of which was the setting up of some precedent for State regulation of conditions of labour.

Although there had been occasional signs of discontent among the workers for some years, it was not until about 1830 that they undertook for themselves a general agitation for the regulation of factory work. At the same time as the campaign for the great Reform Bill was raging, the textile workers of the north pressed for the limitation of working hours; and this agitation was supported by letters in the press, by inflammatory pamphlets, by large public meetings in the manufacturing towns of Yorkshire and Lancashire, and by the presentation of petitions. Extensive measures were taken to stimulate public opinion and to make it efficacious. The workers easily found leaders, both in and out of Parliament, who were ardent in pressing their claims.

In 1831 Michael Sadler, who took charge of the workers' cause in the House of Commons, introduced a Ten Hours' Bill. This Bill met with strong opposition by the manufacturer-members, who, it seems, thought that they could best evade reform by insisting on an inquiry into the facts by a Select Committee. When, however, the Report of the Select Committee (presided over by Sadler) appeared, it proved to be a document which, by the moving character of its revelations and its vivid pictures of appalling hardships and cruelty, would probably ensure a majority for the Bill. The manufacturers proceeded to throw doubts on the reliability of the evidence brought before the Committee and secured the appointment of a Commission, which was to take fresh evidence. The Report of the Commission, while in favour of reform, was in many respects more narrow in its proposals than that of the Committee. It emphasized the claims of the children rather than those of the adults. As a result, Sadler's Bill gave way to a moderate Government Bill, which became the Factory Act of 1833. This piece of legislation, though a sad disappointment to the workers, marked a large advance in the progress towards a proper regulation of factory conditions, particularly by the inclusion of provisions for a centrally administered inspectorate.

¹ The comprehensive and masterly analysis of the relations between public opinion and legislation, supplied by Professor Dicey in his lectures on Law and Public Opinion, renders it superfluous to cover a wide field of illustration.

The passing of the first measure for the regulation of conditions in mines illustrates the influence of public opinion operating in a more direct, more rapid, and more effective manner than it did in respect of the Factory Act of 1833. In 1840 Lord Ashley, in default of a favourable opportunity to make progress in the House of Commons with his programme of social legislation, obtained the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the conditions of children employed in mines. The Report of this Commission appeared in 1842; and, by its means, 'a mass of misery and depravity was unveiled, of which even the warmest friends of the labouring classes had hitherto but a faint conception'.¹ The substantial truth of the amazing disclosures of this Report was unquestionable. It was described as taking the country by storm. The case for reformation had the instant and energetic support of the whole of the press. Within a few weeks of the appearance of the Report, Lord Ashley introduced his Mines Bill, the object of which was to exclude from the pits women, and girls and boys under thirteen years of age; and, after some difficulties in the House of Lords, the Mines Act of 1842 was passed without serious amendment.

Lord Ashley, who has been depicted as an aristocratic humanitarian, was, in fact, fully conscious of the necessity for reliance on public opinion. He spoke of the influence of 'benevolent and instructed' and 'enlightened' public opinion; and, when his Mines Bill was before the House of Lords and in some danger of defeat, he wrote in his diary: 'Now then I am impotent—nothing remains (humanly speaking) but public opinion—were it not for this I should not be able to carry one particle of the Bill.'¹

¹ E. Hodder, Life and Work of the Earl of Shaftesbury, vol. i, p. 412.

Public opinion operated in connexion with the campaign for the improvement of sanitation in towns in much the same way as it did regarding mines. Interest in the subject of public health had not been general before Edwin Chadwick undertook his efforts for its improvement. It is true that the stimulus of successive epidemics of cholera at the end of the eighteenth century had incited a few local societies to press for remedial action. But it was the impression created by the figures published as a result of the passing of the Act for the Registration of Births and Deaths in 1837 which prompted Chadwick to obtain Reports on the results of fever epidemics and the possibility of diminishing their causes. It was due to his initiative that the Poor Law Commissioners were directed, in 1839, to prepare a general Report on public health; and, in 1842, the Report, chiefly the work of Chadwick, was published. It provided a convincing description of overcrowding, inefficient water-supply and drainage, and other scandalous conditions. It proved that a large proportion of total deaths were due to preventable causes.

In 1844 Peel, though unwilling to introduce legislation, appointed a Royal Commission on the Health of Towns, whose Report confirmed that of 1842. After a few years delay, due to the exclusion of interest from any other subject than that of Free Trade, the first Public Health Act was passed in 1848, largely as a result of the influence of public opinion aroused through the publication of Chadwick's Report and that of the Royal Commission. The Bill was in many respects unsatisfactory; but it was a beginning, and it was followed later in the century by more practical measures.

The preceding paragraphs, perhaps, sufficiently outline some of the factors which contributed to the enlarged influence of public opinion as exemplified by the passing of the early measures of social legislation. The serious mischiefs, which arose as the result of rapid extension of industrial activities, not only stimulated a discontent among the workers, which was made public by various methods of agitation, but also evoked sympathy and practical interest among a growing number of humanitarians. It began to be widely realized that the individualistic point of view should be modified and that, if there was a general responsibility for the welfare of all members of the community, the State must become involved in the regulation of the conditions of life of those who were ill qualified to protect themselves. The principle of social solidarity was recognized. There were not lacking unselfish leaders, like Shaftesbury, Sadler, Oastler, and Chadwick, who were willing to advance the cause of those who needed protection. One of the most noteworthy factors affecting public opinion was the dissemination of information through the publication of Reports of Committees and Commissions. On more than one occasion, the opponents of reform secured the appointment of bodies of inquiry in the hope of delaying or defeating legislation. No device could have proved more futile. The rapid effect on the legislature of the disclosures made by Reports and their reception in the country is one of the outstanding features of the progress of social legislation in the nineteenth century.

¹ E. Hodder, Life and Work of the Earl of Shaftesbury, vol. 1, p. 420.

Although the above-mentioned instances of the influence of public opinion mark an important stage in the development of the people's part in government in modern times, they are not to be regarded as illustrating its full scope. The admission of the principles of State interference respecting conditions of employment and living was followed by that which Dicey calls 'equalization of advantages'. The passing of the Education Acts, of 1870 and after, is the most obvious example of the application of this latter principle; and public opinion played a large part in reinforcing the efforts of the educationalists. Public opinion, moreover, obtained further opportunities of gaining in efficacy not only by the enlargement of its range and intensity of general influence, but also by the exercise of its particular function of preparing the way for the decision of issues at general elections.

Various circumstances tended, from and after the later years of the eighteenth century, to enable the people to take an instructed interest in many aspects of the business of government. It is not possible to do more than make a passing reference to the methods of spreading information on politics. The increase in circulation and improvement in the quality of the press, after the institution of such papers as The Times and The Morning Post, were conspicuous. The setback through the unfortunate repressive legislation following on the unrest induced by the French Revolution was only temporary. One of the Six Acts¹ of 1819 was passed because 'pamphlets and printed papers containing observations upon public events and occurrences, tending to excite hatred and contempt of the Government and Constitution of these realms as by law established . . . have lately been published in great numbers and at very small prices'. The Act imposed a newspaper stamp-duty on certain types of publications in order that they 'should be restrained'. The high cost of newspapers prevented those below the middle class from having much opportunity of reading them. Nevertheless, Lord John Russell, in proposing a motion for reform of the representation in 1822, gave figures proving the considerable augmentation in the circulation of newspapers in the preceding thirty or forty years, and spoke of the large number of books sold at cheap prices and the increase in the number of circulating libraries and book clubs.²

A new attitude soon manifested itself. The newspaper stamp-duty was reduced from fourpence to one penny in 1836 and was abolished in 1855. The chief remaining obstacle to newspaper circulation, namely, the paper duty, was removed by Gladstone in 1861. At the time of the Reform Bill debates of 1866 and 1867 both Gladstone and Disraeli remarked on the improvements in the opportunities of the people to obtain political education since the passing of the Reform Act of 1832. The former emphasized, among other factors, the institution of free libraries and institutes; and the latter discoursed on 'the increased application of science to social life', exemplified particularly by facilities for inexpensive travel.³

In very recent years rapid progress has been made, by means of further cheapening of newspapers, the publication of well-written literature at inexpensive prices, and the bringing of the views of leading politicians into almost the poorest homes by broadcasting, to educate and develop public opinion. The dissemination of authoritative information has increased amazingly both in amount and frequency.

¹ 60 Geo. III and 1 Geo. IV, c. 9.

² 7 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 56 ff.

³ 182 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1132 ff.; 185 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 219; 186 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 7.

Whereas, only a quarter of a century ago, the number of persons in the country able to enter into a reasonable discussion of many of the problems of politics cannot have exceeded tens of thousands, it would probably not be an exaggeration to say that nowadays hundreds of thousands are able to take a sensible part in the formation of public opinion. It must be admitted that there are those who regard the newspapers as dangerous guides and who would prefer political knowledge to be spread by other kinds of literature. Yet, though some sections of the press have inclined rather in the direction of stirring up prejudice and passion than in that of inducing a calm judgement on public questions, the advantages rendered to political education by a wide circulation of newspapers are undeniable.

Mention should also be made of the improved opportunities for the people to gain knowledge of the happenings in Parliament. The increase in the number of persons reading the reports of parliamentary proceedings has made possible a more intelligent appreciation of current political questions. The expressions of opinion which this appreciation has evoked has received the attention of Ministers. In this way, a mutuality or reciprocity of influence has been stimulated, the Parliament on the people and the people on Parliament, which has become a cardinal factor in the operation of public opinion.

By gradual steps the claims of the people to full information on the course of parliamentary business came to be admitted. Even the conservative principles of Dr. Johnson enabled him to declare that every Englishman was entitled to expect that he should be kept informed of the course of national affairs, subject to the necessity of maintaining secrecy in regard to some aspects of future policy. Charles James Fox, whose views on the freedom of the press remained illiberal only for a short period, argued in 1778 that 'the public had a right to know what passed in Parliament'.¹ The public had, in fact, at the time when this remark was made, the opportunity of reading reports of debates in something like their modern form in such papers as The Morning Post, Lloyd's Evening Post, and The London Courant.

The nation owes a debt of gratitude to Cobbett, who, impressed by the importance of the wide publication of accurate reports of parliamentary proceedings, initiated his series of Parliamentary Debates in 1804, and who, in 1806, organized the production of his Parliamentary History. After the beginning of the nineteenth century due attention was paid to the verbal accuracy of the reports. This could be relied upon before the recognition of parliamentary reporters by the Orders of the House of Commons came tardily in 1845. Perhaps, owing to the increased importance of the Ministry at the expense of Parliament and to the diversion of interest stimulated by platform speeches of party leaders, it may not now be correct to say, as was said by Lord Justice Cockburn in the leading case of Wason v. Walter (1868), that the reason for the people having the deepest interest in what happens in Parliament is that 'on what is there said and done the welfare of the community depends'.¹ Nevertheless public opinion is still in a large measure fostered and directed through a general acquaintance with the reports of parliamentary proceedings.

¹ 19 Parl. Hist. 648.

It was not until the early part of the nineteenth century that official publications were available to the general public. At that period, it seems, prints of Bills, Reports, and the like, were officially circulated to local government officers and corporate bodies, as well as public libraries, whenever it appeared that their subjects were likely to be of general concern.² Canning held enlightened views on the free circulation of State papers and the publication of a considerable amount of information regarding foreign politics. In 1835 a Select Committee of the House of Commons remarked that 'the advantage to the community by the diffusion of that information, which can, in the generality of cases, be obtained only through the House of Commons, must be evident to every member who had directed his attention to the subject'; and it recommended that 'Parliamentary Papers and Reports printed for the use of the House should be rendered accessible to the public by purchase at the lowest price they can be furnished'.³ Very soon after this date the growth in the sales of Parliamentary Papers and Reports was pronounced. Its connexion with the passing of social legislation has been noticed at the beginning of the present chapter. And, since the middle of the nineteenth century, the number of sales of official publications, such as Reports of Royal Commissions, has continued to increase. The effect of this increase on the formation of public opinion must be large.

¹ Wason v. Walter (1868), 4 Q.B. 73, at p. 89.

² Report of Select Committee on Printed Papers, 1837, evidence of L. G. Hansard.

³ Report of Select Committee on Printed Papers, 1835; and see Report of Select Committee on Parliamentary Papers, 1853.

It has been freely admitted for many years that public opinion should have an influence, not merely on the broad principles of legislation, but also on some of its particular provisions, especially those of comprehensive measures the general objects of which are undisputed. During the last hundred years it has been customary for Bills to be published, so as to enable any marked attitude of public opinion in regard to them to be expressed before they are dealt with in Parliament. If features prove clearly to be opposed to popular feeling, steps are taken to have them amended.

By the middle of the nineteenth century a practice had grown up of allowing a sufficient period to elapse between the first introduction of a Bill into Parliament and its second reading to enable the views of the general public to be expressed in regard to it. Disraeli took occasion, in a debate on a Reform Bill in 1852, to urge on the Ministry of the day the observance of this usage. It was only fair, he said, that the opinion of the people should be ascertained in regard to the considerable alterations in the franchise, which were proposed and which were comprised in the Bill, prior to its second reading. He mentioned the circumstances of the introduction of the first Reform Bill and of the provisions for the repeal of the Corn Laws in support of his view of the proper practice.¹

At the present day public bodies and associations sometimes assert that they should have an opportunity of discussing and commenting on the provisions of Bills in which they have a particular interest. When, in 1927 for instance, it was known that a new Unemployment Insurance Bill was shortly to be introduced, a member asked in the House of Commons whether the Bill would be printed and circulated in time for it to be discussed by trade union meetings which were shortly to be held.²

Further, matters have so far advanced in the consultation of interested and representative bodies during the period of preparation of legislation that Bills are frequently the outcome of accommodations reached by Ministers and those concerned. In pursuance of a recent development, it has occasionally been the practice for provisions of the annual Finance Bill to be settled by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with persons representing big trading interests. Most of the legislation dealing with economic and social matters is drafted in the first instance in Government Departments; and Departments, such as the Ministry of Health, the Board of Education, the Board of Trade, and the Ministry of Labour, prepare Bills in consultation with local government associations, trade union officials, Chambers of Commerce, and employers' federations. When the Road Traffic Act was being prepared by the Minister of Transport in 1930, he announced that the Highway Code, being of direct or indirect interest to everybody, would be the subject of consultation with a large number of associations before the final draft was submitted for the approval of Parliament. 'I shall take into consideration', the Minister said, 'the views and criticisms of the press and the public, as well as the views of the wide range of representative bodies with whom I shall be in touch.' Again, in 1932, the Minister of Agriculture met the representatives of the millers, the farmers, and the corn trade to discuss the terms of a Bill which had been drafted in his Department in order to encourage home-grown wheat. The object of this discussion was the agreement of amendments to the draft Bill, acceptable to all parties, before it was presented to Parliament. This kind of consultation is now a matter of routine.

¹ 119 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 302.

² 209 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1216-18.

It is often pointed out, with much justification, that many modern statutes consist merely of skeleton provisions, to which are added powers to issue subordinate legislation, in the nature of orders and regulations. These orders and regulations are generally made by Government Departments. This tendency became marked towards the end of the nineteenth century; and, as a result of a general dissatisfaction at a large body of ordinances, many of which dealt with matters affecting the everyday life of the people, being launched without any previous warning, the Rules Publication Act, 1893, was passed. By virtue of this Act it became necessary for notice of certain classes of subordinate legislation to be published. Some cases not covered by this Act have been specially met by provisions in particular Acts to the effect that, prior to the issue of subordinate legislation, notice of the proposed issue and of the place where copies of the draft can be obtained shall be published in the manner 'best adapted for ensuring publicity'.¹

Several modern statutes include provisions for reference to consultative or advisory committees before regulations can be made by Government Departments under the powers conferred on them. These committees frequently include in their membership not only persons technically qualified, but also persons who represent the interests concerned in the widest sense.² But there is considerable difficulty in ensuring sufficient publicity, where the regulations relate to the general public and not to interests which are organized.³

As a result of changes in political organization during the nineteenth century, it has been increasingly plain that public opinion influences the Ministry directly, rather than through its effect on individual members. When Bagehot attributed the impossibility of 'a steady opposition to a formal public opinion' to a fear in the mind of each member that he might lose his seat, he was describing a situation which was passing away.⁴ It is hardly expected nowadays that a member should change sides with changes of public opinion. He would be as likely to lose his seat if he forfeited the official sponsorship of his party organization as if he displayed a lack of independence.

The promptitude with which Ministries respond to movements of the public mind may vary according to circumstances. It will, perhaps, be less marked when there is a safe and solid majority to rely on than when there is not. But it has been proved that Ministries will involve themselves and their followers in certain defeat if they persist in neglecting obvious signs of warning from the sovereign people. The action of a representative assembly in which there is never a reliable majority (such as that of France) has been thought to assist the accurate reflection of public feeling. Whether or not political instability is, in the long run, conducive to democratic development is an interesting and difficult question.

There was in the nineteenth century considerable divergence in the views of leading politicians regarding the degree

¹ e.g. Ministry of Health Act, 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. V, c. 21), s. 8 (2); Mining Industry Act, 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. V, c. 50), s. 2 (5).

² Cf. Report of Committee on Ministers' Powers (1932), Cmd. 4060, pp. 47-8.

³ Ibid., p. 54.

⁴ W. Bagehot, The English Constitution (1909 ed.), p. 241.

of attention to be paid to public opinion, although it became obvious that progressive extensions of the franchise would inevitably lead to an increased respect for the attitude of the people. It is a little difficult to accept word for word the estimate of Lord Salisbury (or Lord Robert Cecil as he then was), who wrote, in 1864, that 'any policy which is approved by the mass of the nation is certain to be promptly adopted by its rulers', and conversely that 'no Government could exist in England three months that was acting in the face of a decided national conviction'.¹ It is doubtful if this description could be accurately applied to the present time; but Lord Salisbury's biography, by his daughter, proves that he himself, when Prime Minister, was frequently influenced in his foreign policy by a sense of the probable attitude of public opinion; and he occasionally informed foreign diplomatists of the necessity of his being governed by this influence.

Some of the most eminent and enlightened constitutionalists have held views not far removed from those of exclusive or absolute representation to which reference has already been made. If they did not think that all power was irretrievably surrendered during the life of a Parliament, at least they thought that Parliament in its wisdom was more likely to act for the essential well-being of the nation, when it could consider questions of policy unprejudiced by protest and clamour from without. Canning, in a debate on parliamentary reform in 1822, cited various instances where Parliament had proved right and the people wrong, where Parliament had either been more advanced or more cautious than the people, but with final justification; and he refused to admit that the legislature should necessarily and immediately reflect the apparent sense of the people. 'I do not believe', he observed, 'that to increase the power of the people—or rather to bring that power into more direct, immediate, and incessant operation upon the House . . . would enable the House to discharge its functions more usefully than it discharges them at present.'² Nevertheless, it has been said of him that he 'did much to extend and create a popular interest in affairs by the liberal publication of State Papers, and by his popular progresses and circuits. He was the first Minister of importance who habitually delivered addresses to his constituents.'³ He was the first foreign secretary who elaborately explained and expounded his policy beyond the four walls of St. Stephens.'¹

¹ Quarterly Review, July 1864. Cf. some opinions expressed by him in 1872 and quoted on p. 219 n. 2 below.

² 7 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 133.

³ Cf. his speeches at Leeds.

It is not fair to charge statesmen with embracing particular views on the ground of a few extracts from their speeches isolated from their contexts; but Peel so frequently in the course of his career reiterated his preference for the opinion of Parliament to that of the people that he stands out as one of the chief exponents of what has been described as the principle of absolute representation. In a debate on Roman Catholic claims, some few years before his conversion to concession, he observed:

'Much has been said of the opinions which prevail out of doors. Of these, or the impressions which they diffuse, I own that I am perfectly careless; . . . believing as I do, that the deliberate wisdom of Parliament is better calculated to weigh maturely the important bearings of any great question, than the general opinion of parties elsewhere.'²

When opposing the great Reform Bill, he claimed that it was the duty of the representatives of the people not to be swayed by popular clamour, but to look prospectively to the true interests of the country.³ And again, when speaking on a motion of want of confidence in the Ministry of Melbourne in 1841, he said that it was unwise to admit any other recognized organ of public opinion than the House of Commons. 'It is dangerous', he asserted, 'to set up the implied or supposed opinions of constituencies against their declared and authorized organ, the House of Commons.'⁴

Statements very like negations of the admissibility of public opinion, as a continuous influence on the course of public affairs, can be found as late as the present century. Asquith, in a speech on the Parliament Bill of 1911, said:

'We all of us start from one common point—the assumption which lies at the root of representative government, that the House of Commons, itself a product of popular election, is, under normal conditions, a trustworthy organ and mouthpiece of the popular will. . . . How else are we to ascertain what the people think and desire?'⁵

Expressions such as these are not inconsistent with democratic government; but, at the same time, there lurks in

¹ H. W. V. Temperley, Life of Canning, pp. 100–2.

² 4 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1003.

⁴ 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 817.

³ 4 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 188.

⁵ 21 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1748.

modern debates a little of the outworn attitude, to the effect that public opinion is something, if not to be circumvented, at least to be appeased, rather than something which, if only it can be definitely ascertained, should promptly be followed.

§ 7. Public opinion and voting

It has already been remarked that the operation of public opinion has been to a large extent transformed since the general acceptance of the principle of mandate. The people have for more than half a century been treated as capable of deciding issues on the occasion of general elections. In so far as it is possible to place clear issues before the electorate, decisions so procured are more conclusive than inferences drawn from the observation of the workings of public opinion, the forces of which are difficult to measure. It may not be quite clear what is decided at a general election; but there is a numerical result. The clearer the issues, the stronger the claim to recognition. On the other hand, public opinion, free and at large, has more opportunity to display the movements of the mind of the nation unrestricted by issues specially prepared by party leaders and untrammelled by the misleading characteristics of mere numbers. Weight of opinion is given due effect.

But public opinion and voting are not in their essence two alternative means by which the people exercise their sway. The counting of votes is merely a formal means of ascertaining at intervals the state of public opinion, especially now that there exists an adequate system of representation. The recognition of voting as a decisive factor in politics only became feasible because public opinion had previously been active, and has shown informally, so to speak, the manner in which the people's influence could develop. And public opinion, in its informal operation, has continued to prepare the way for its formal expression, even after that formal expression has become prevalent. Indeed, the degree in which inferences drawn from the results of general elections are useful is largely dependent on the extent of the preparatory action of public opinion.

CHAPTER IV

PUBLIC OPINION AND GOVERNMENT (cont.)

A SKETCH of the influence of public opinion on government must include notice of the development of the various means, which are or have been habitual, if not recognized, of representing the views of sections of the people to their governors. The methods employed have changed in the course of the last two or three centuries, as a result of a combination of causes, the chief of which are the alteration in the distribution of political power, due mainly to the extension of the franchise, and the growth of the capacity of the people to understand questions of politics, following on improved education and distribution of information. The manner in which these methods have operated may best be noticed by dealing with them seriatim, although the periods of their employment have, in fact, overlapped.

§ 1. Petitioning

No general practice of petitioning in regard to the conduct of public affairs was apparent until the period immediately preceding the Commonwealth. Earlier petitions were, with the rarest exceptions, confined to the redress of private or local grievances or mischiefs. In 1640 several counties presented petitions complaining of the injustice of ship-money, monopolies, the Star Chamber and other matters; and in the following years there was a constant flow of petitions asking for peace, the dispersal of the army, and for similar reliefs or remedies.¹ It was soon found by Parliament that these public petitions were a source, not only of civil commotion, but also of embarrassment to the Government. Often petitioners who lived near London advanced with much disorder to present their petitions in a body. Both Houses made declarations in 1648 against petitions being presented in a tumultuous manner.² Shortly after the Restoration a statute was passed regulating tumultuous petitions and providing that no petition should be presented by more than twenty persons unless with the consent of three or more justices of the peace.¹ The Statute recited that the disorderly preparation of petitions was 'a great means of the late unhappy wars, confusions, and calamities in this nation'—a curious point of view.

¹ 2 Parl. Hist. 542, 639 ff., and passim; 3 Parl. Hist. passim; Somers, Tracts, 2nd Collection, vol. ii (1750), p. 103; R. R. Sharpe, London and the Kingdom, vol. ii, p. 331; The Journal of Sir Simonds d'Ewes (ed. Notestein), pp. 5, 16.

² 3 Parl. Hist. 888.

For some few years the parliamentary history of petitioning consisted of attempts to regulate and curtail the practice, alternating with resolutions and protests in favour of it. In December 1679 Shaftesbury was astute enough to realize that petitions could be effectively used as a weapon in party warfare; and his Green Ribbon Club organized a vast campaign for the collection of signatures to petitions in favour of the assembly of Parliament. The petitions were not a spontaneous expression of national feeling; but they were portentous in their bulk; and they led to the issue of a proclamation prohibiting the agitation or promotion of petitions 'for specious ends and purposes to the publick', as tending to 'promote discontents among the people, and to raise sedition and rebellion'.² With the aid of promptings by the agents of the Crown, many addresses expressing 'abhorrence' of the petitions were presented. In the next year, however, Parliament resolved that 'it is and ever hath been the undoubted right of the subjects of England to petition the King for the calling and sitting of Parliaments and the redressing of grievances'.³ The Bill of Rights of 1688 maintained that 'it is the right of subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal'. But it was still necessary to provide against disorder in the manner of presentation of petitions; and the House of Commons framed orders, in 1689 and 1699, governing the presentation of petitions to the House. With the exception of petitions from the City of London, all petitions were to be presented by a member of the House.

The circumstances of the famous Kentish petition of 1701 illustrate the biased and prejudiced manner in which the Commons were apt to treat protests contrary to the feeling of the majority of members. At the time when this petition was presented, party feeling was running very high. The Tories, who were in power, were bitterly opposed to the King's war policy. The terms of the petition were not such as to merit ignominious treatment. It was temperate in matter and respectful in form. It humbly implored the House of Commons to enable the King to assist his allies before it was too late. But the House of Commons voted the presentation of the petition a breach of privilege, and ordered the imprisonment of the gentlemen who presented it, resolving 'that the said petition was scandalous, tending to destroy the constitution of parliaments, and to subvert the established government of these realms'. The Ministry was soon replaced by one more in sympathy with the national sentiments. Meanwhile, numerous tracts appeared in vindication of the right of petitioning. Two of them, Somers's Jura Populi Anglicani or the Subjects' Right of Petitioning set forth and Defoe's Legion Memorial, are as well known as any political tracts in the language.

¹ 13 Chas. II, c. 5.

² See note on p. 36 above.

³ 4 Parl. Hist. 1174. See also A Seasonable Memorial in some Historical Notes upon the Liberties of the Presse, &c. (1680), p. 21, in which it was contended that the multitude have no right to intermeddle in matters of State in which they have no skill, such as the calling and dissolving of Parliaments. It was suggested that porters and carmen might just as well petition for the better government of the herring-trade in Yarmouth.

About a year after the presentation of the Kentish petition the House of Commons was still, it seems, more interested in its own dignity than in the rights of the people. It adopted a set of resolutions respecting its liberties and privileges; and, apparently, it was only induced as an afterthought by the Marquis of Hartington to include a resolution similar in form to one passed twenty years before—that it was 'the undoubted right of the people of England to petition and address to the King, for the calling, sitting, and dissolving of parliaments, and for the redressing of grievances'.¹

Throughout the eighteenth and much of the nineteenth centuries, petitions were frequently presented as a result of every kind of public grievance, not excluding grievances respecting impositions of taxation, although the House of Commons, for obvious reasons, made it a practice not to receive petitions against Money Bills.² When the acceptance of the petition of the City of London against the Excise Scheme of 1733 was debated in the House, the Ministry asserted that the petition was incapable of being received, and further alleged, absurdly enough, that no hardship would be suffered by refusing to receive it, because every petitioner was represented in the House. The Excise Scheme never became law; but petitions against another financial measure, which was duly enacted by Parliament, succeeded in obtaining its repeal in 1766. Three years previously, a tax had been imposed on cider and perry. All the cider and perry counties presented petitions against it; and, such was the character and extent of the agitation, that the imposition was forthwith removed.

¹ 5 Parl. Hist. 1339-40.

² See a discussion in 1842, 62 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 5 ff., 200 ff., 2 6 ff.

The intensity of feeling in regard to the Middlesex Election in 1769 and 1770, and in regard to economical and parliamentary reform in 1779 and 1780, naturally had its counterpart in a free use of petitions. In the former instance, many constituencies begged the King to remove his Ministers and to choose new advisers.¹ In the latter instance, no less than twenty-four counties, as well as many other constituencies, presented petitions against the corrupt influence of the Crown. On the same day as that on which the House of Commons adopted Dunning's famous motion, that 'the influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished', it resolved that 'it is the duty of this House to provide, as far as may be, an immediate and effectual redress of the abuses complained of in the petitions to this House from the different counties, cities and towns of this kingdom'.² Petitions, however, on such subjects as the war with America and parliamentary reform, were presented in the course of the following years with but small effect.

The right of petitioning was not directly restricted by the repressive legislation of the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries, though some of the legislation placing restrictions on associations and public meetings must have had the effect of hampering the free use of this method of expression. Pitt, in a debate on the Seditious Meetings Bill in 1795, affirmed 'the right of the people to express their opinions on political men and measures, and to discuss and assert their right of petitioning all branches of the legislature'.³ The effects of repression were, in fact, short-lived. The number of petitions in the five years ending in 1831 were twenty times greater than those in the last five years of the eighteenth century. Anti-slavery petitions were presented in 1814 and 1833, with about a million and a million and a half signatures respectively. These and the universal petitions in favour of reform, culminating in those of 1831-2, must be counted as the most signal examples of the use of petitioning as a means of popular agitation.

¹ See London Chronicle and Lloyd's Evening Post for Nov. and Dec. 1769.

² 21 Parl. Hist. 367.

³ 32 Parl. Hist. 274.

After the failure of the last of the monster petitions of the Chartists in 1848 Disraeli took the opportunity of justifying, in a speech in the House of Commons, the procedure and attitude of Parliament in regard to the acceptance of petitions. He obviously intended his remarks to be addressed to an audience beyond the limits of the House.

'There is an idea', he said, 'that the presentation of a petition is an empty form—that it is ordered to lie on the table, and is never heard of again. Now it is as well that our constituents should know that every petition laid on the table is scrutinized by a select committee of the most experienced and influential members of this House—that every petition which, from the importance of its subject or the ability of its statements appears to merit particular notice, is printed at the public cost, and afterwards circulated among members; and I believe that at this moment the right of petition . . . is a more important and efficient right than has ever been enjoyed at any time by the people of England in this respect.'¹

But the employment of this right, after reaching its 'peak' in the second half of the nineteenth century, has gradually declined towards desuetude. In the five years ending in 1789, 880 petitions were presented; in the five years ending in 1831, 24,492; in the five years ending in 1872, 101,573; in the five years ending in 1882, 72,850; in the five years ending in 1922 the numbers fell to 245; and the numbers have remained comparatively small since the last-mentioned date.

This method of expressing general opinion has, it seems, been superseded by others. The House of Commons found, towards the middle of the nineteenth century, that a disproportionate amount of time was spent in debates on the presentation of petitions. It was accordingly provided that there should be no debate on the occasion of presentation except in urgent cases. This rule did not cause any immediate diminution in the number of petitions;² but its application, and the absence of publicity resulting from it, may well provide a partial explanation of the later decline in numbers.³

Many of the giant petitions, especially those from the Chartists, were proved to contain a large proportion of

¹ 101 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 673.

² The proportion of signatures to numbers of petitions decreased before the middle of the nineteenth century.

³ After 1833 the proportion of petitions to be printed was much reduced; see First Report of Select Committee on Publication of Printed Papers, 1840.

spurious signatures. The general failure of confidence thus engendered doubtless communicated itself to those who had thoughts of organizing petitions. It was realized, too, that many of the genuine signatures were those of persons who could have very little interest in the subject-matter of the petitions, since the expedients used for collecting or obtaining signatures were frequently unprincipled and discreditable. The authenticity of petitions was mistrusted at an early stage in their use. In 1640 and 1641 it seems that unscrupulous means were adopted in the collection of signatures.¹ And, for a long time, only a small proportion of signatories can have been capable of forming an opinion on any question of politics. Dr. Johnson, deriding the value of petitions at the time of the agitation respecting the Middlesex Election, wrote in the False Alarm: 'One man signs because he has vowed destruction to the turn-pikes; one because he owed his landlord nothing; one because he is rich; another because he is poor; one to show that he is not afraid, and another to show that he can write.' When, however, in the nineteenth century a more sensible view was taken of popular intervention in matters of government, it was seen that methods which had frequently been proved to be open to suspicion might fail to be effective.

But there are other, and more obvious, reasons for the decline. Now that the representation of the people is adequately provided for by a very wide extension of the franchise, there are no longer deficiencies to be mitigated by the presentation of petitions. The practice of petitioning was chiefly suitable to a period in which the representation of the people was defective, or in which the Government was unresponsive to the views of the people. A Ministry's hopes of retaining office do not depend, at the present day, merely on a limited number of voters whose views, even if they were free and untrammelled, might not be coincident with those of the people in the broad sense of that term. They depend on the votes of virtually the whole of the people. It is obvious, therefore, that the Government will, as a general rule, take pains to be susceptible to any clear movement of public opinion. It is incomparably easier than it was for general opinions to be collected and appreciated, owing to a press of vast circulation and to amazing improvement in means of communication. It is not, then, so necessary as it was for the people to sign and present monster petitions in order to propagate grievances, which, with modern methods, can be made to echo through the land from end to end in a more expeditious and sensational manner.

¹ Clarendon, History of the Rebellion (ed. Macray), vol. 1, p. 271.

Again, it would be something of an anachronism to petition Parliament at the present day, if this proceeding did not aim at the Ministry; for the time is now well past when Parliament can be regarded as ruling the country. For this reason, it is found that, even in the early stages of the nineteenth century, associations presented addresses to Ministers instead of petitioning Parliament. The Anti-Slavery delegates presented addresses to Ministers in 1833. The Anti-Corn Law League arranged for deputations in 1840 and the following years. It is evident that representations to the very individuals in whose power it was to give or to refuse what was desired seemed more likely to succeed than a formal approach to Parliament, which was beginning to lose its supremacy and which, notwithstanding the assurances of Disraeli that have just been quoted, often did nothing else but let the petition rest on the table.

Deputations, therefore, from many kinds of bodies, waited on Ministers in regard to numerous subjects throughout Victorian times. In November 1841 a deputation from the Short Time Committees of the West Riding approached Peel and other Ministers to urge the importance of the limitation of working hours in factories and received a favourable reception, but no promises. Gladstone, in particular, was approached by organized bodies of every class. In 1863 what was described as the largest deputation that ever waited on a Minister requested him to prevent the removal of the exemption from income-tax enjoyed by charitable corporations. It was headed by the Duke of Cambridge and attended by both Archbishops. The objects of the deputation were attained, although Gladstone was personally opposed to them. In 1886 the London Trades Council came to Gladstone in a deputation, asking him to take up the question of a legal eight-hour day. This plea proved unsuccessful. These are but isolated instances of a frequent practice which continues to the present day.

From two points of view deputations have advantages over petitioning. The members of deputations, although only representative of those having a grievance, can advance their case with more persuasiveness and authority than absent petitioners. Further, the Prime Minister or other Minister, who is the object of the deputation, if not more likely than Parliament to give a favourable answer, is more likely than Parliament to be in a position to give a prompt and definite one, based on an intelligent, and possibly sympathetic, consideration of the representations urged upon him.

§ 2. Public meetings

There were, from time to time, in early periods of English history, gatherings of people whose object was to demonstrate to their rulers by visual means the amount of support which existed, in numbers at least, for a change in law or government. Frequently these gatherings had no specific proposals to advance, and expressed no more than attempts to overawe the Sovereign or Parliament by suggestions of force. Others were merely musters of a rudimentary kind contrived by those who had some public grievance to which they wished to draw attention.¹ But meetings called in order to form, diffuse, and express the views of sections of the people on political subjects are characteristic of a fairly widespread education, and did not become habitual on a large scale, as a recognized means of expressing public opinion, until towards the end of the eighteenth century.

It is possible, however, to find instances at earlier dates of political meetings, not merely in connexion with the election of members of Parliament, but for the consideration and furtherance of proposals. There is some slight evidence of their happening so as to assist the preparation of petitions in the reign of Charles I;² and there were doubtless meetings preliminary to the presentation of petitions during the reigns of the later Stuarts.³ In the course of the seventeenth century, meetings were evidently held with the object of promoting the designs of one or other of the opposing sides in politics.⁴ During the agitation against the Excise Scheme at the end of 1732 'a great number of merchants, traders and citizens' met at the Swan Tavern in Cornhill and appointed representatives to wait on the members for the

¹ Even in quite recent times agitators have used such simple forms of political demonstration as the organized procession.

² Clarendon, History of the Rebellion (ed. Macray), vol. i, p. 271.

³ Chandler's Debates, vol. v, pp. 134, 141.

⁴ Hist. MSS. Comm., 5th Report, p. 346 (1642); pp. 300-1, 24 Mar. 1654, Cromwell to Justices of the Peace of Worcester; 3rd Report, Appendix, p. 245, 27 May 1660, Arlinton to Derby.

City of London, to request their opposition to the Scheme.¹ And in the early part of 1733 a large number of public meetings were held in various parts of the country with the intention of instructing members in the same sense.² In 1763 they were held in all the apple-growing counties to consider the presentation of petitions and other steps to secure the repeal of the cider tax;³ and in 1769 and 1770 they were widely employed in important constituencies with the object of organizing protests on the matter of the people's right of election.⁴ They were recommended by Burke, in his Thoughts on the Present Discontents, in 1770.

'Until a confidence is re-established,' he said, 'the people ought to be excited to a more strict and detailed attention to the conduct of their representatives. Standards for judging more systematically upon their conduct ought to be settled in meetings of counties and corporations.'

These instances, taken from different stages of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, have been mentioned because the use of public meetings for political purposes has sometimes been described so as to suggest that it began in 1779 and 1780.⁵ This use certainly became habitual to an extent that was unprecedented in those years. There were large assemblies in every county for the purpose of drawing up petitions.⁶ Advertisements announcing them may be read in the daily press for December 1779 and January 1780. They were looked upon with intense suspicion by the Government; and Fox found it necessary solemnly to maintain in debate that 'the people out of doors . . . possessed a right to declare their opinion of men and things, in order to do which they might meet and consult together, provided they did it in a peaceable, orderly manner'. On a later

¹ Political State of Great Britain, vol. xlv, p. 141.

² See tracts mentioned on p. 42 above.

³ London Chronicle, July, Aug., and Sept., 1763.

⁴ Wyvill, Political Papers, vol. 1, pp. xvi, xxi; London Chronicle, Mar. 1770.

⁵ Cf. May, Constitutional History (ed. Holland), vol. ii, p. 21, and 41 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 1254.

⁶ The 'county meetings', which were very generally held in the second half of the eighteenth century, for the purpose of passing resolutions or preparing petitions on matters of public interest, seem to have had a peculiar status. They may claim to be connected with the ancient shire moot or county court, although, being distinct from the gathering of justices, they formed no part of what is commonly understood to be local government. They were in most instances convoked by the High Sheriff; but, on one or two occasions, he refused to act. See S. and B. Webb, English Local Government, vol. i, p. 533 (note); Wyvill, Political Papers, vol. i, p. xxi.

occasion he described public meetings as 'not only lawful, but agreeable to the very essence of the British Constitution'.¹

The unrest following on the French Revolution of 1789 led, among other repressive legislation, to the passing of statutes prohibiting seditious meetings and to the imposition of stringent restrictions on meetings of any kind. The recitals to an Act of 1795, and to later Acts in similar form, described assemblies collected for the purpose, or under the pretext, of agreeing on petitions as having been made use of 'to serve the ends of factious and seditious persons, to the great danger of the public peace, and to the production of confusion and calamities in the nation'. There is still on the Statute-book a curious relic of this phase of legislative restraint, namely, a provision which prohibits gatherings of more than fifty persons within a mile of Westminster Hall, when Parliament or the Courts are sitting, for the purpose of presenting petitions or addresses on political matters.² The failure of the Government to take effective steps towards the alleviation of distress after the end of the war in 1815 and to exhibit any confidence in the people was followed by a number of vast meetings pressing for universal suffrage and other reforms, and led, almost inevitably, to a tragedy of the magnitude of Peterloo, which, in turn, brought in its train the Six Acts of 1819, one of which³ was designed to restrict the holding of public meetings and was similar in its terms to Acts of 1795 and 1817. All meetings of more than fifty persons for political and kindred purposes were prohibited, with the exception of 'county meetings' called by the Lord-Lieutenant or Sheriff, meetings of corporate towns called by the Mayor, meetings called by five or more justices of the peace or those of parishioners within their own parishes. The large unincorporated towns of the north suffered an unfair disadvantage. This Act remained effective for five years.

At the time of the campaign for the great Reform Bill the holding of public meetings for the purpose of influencing the Government continued in vogue, and was doubtless a powerful factor in the success of the struggle. William IV, among others at that time, was suspicious of the epidemic and asserted that these demonstrations were not 'a just criterion of the sentiments of the people'. In his view their object, so far from being the championship of popular progress, was 'the promotion of discontent and the disturbance of the public peace'.¹ In 1832 and 1833 large meetings were held in Lancashire and Yorkshire by the factory workers to urge the passing of the Ten Hours' Bill. The Earl of Shaftesbury, when Lord Ashley, organized a rapid series of addresses to workers in the north in support of the same cause.

¹ 32 Parl. Hist. 278.

² 60 Geo. III & 1 Geo. IV, c. 6.

³ 57 Geo. III, c. 19, s. 23.

Public meetings played a considerable part in Victorian history; and the question of parliamentary reform again led to demonstrations of this kind in 1866. By this time, however, a more sensible view was taken of their propriety. Disraeli, as a Minister of the Crown, when suggesting to the Queen that some public places should be provided 'where the great body of the people . . . should have the right to assemble, and discuss, and express their opinion', observed that public meetings are 'the recognized and indispensable organs of a free constitution. They are safety valves.'² The right of holding public meetings in the Royal Parks in London, which was denied by the authorities in 1866, was treated in a manner not unsatisfactory to the people in 1872.³ It was, however, stated in the *Trafalgar Square Case*⁴ in 1888 that there is no right of public meeting in a public thoroughfare or place of public resort. Meetings in places of public resort are, nevertheless, allowed within prescribed limits and times, if no disorder is apprehended; and the fact that political gatherings are held on a highway does not necessarily make them unlawful.⁵ The Trafalgar Square Case recalls the widely organized Socialist meetings of the latter part of the nineteenth century, which occupy a unique place in the history of this method of expressing general opinions. No other class of meetings, perhaps, has had a larger effect on the course of politics in this country.

The number of political gatherings, unconnected with parliamentary candidatures, has probably diminished in the course of the last half century. The profusion of speeches arranged in the early days of the caucus was not long maintained. To some extent, the reasons for the decay in the practice of petitioning apply also to the apparent decrease

¹ Correspondence between William IV and Lord Grey, vol. i, p. 98.

² Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli (new ed.), vol. ii, p. 184.

³ See Paul, History of Modern England, vol. iii, p. 303; and The Parks Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict., c. 15) and regulations thereunder.

⁴ R. v. Cunninghame Graham and Burns (1888), 16 Cox C.C. 420; and see debate in 322 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1879 ff.

⁵ Burden v. Rigler, [1911] 1 K.B. 335.

in the number of public meetings held for political purposes. Now that every adult has, in general, a capacity to take a share in the government of the country, the necessity for the use of unofficially organized methods of expression is lessened. The improvement in the means of the dissemination of information provides another reason for the change.

Those partaking in any form of political agitation have had to reckon with the provisions of the criminal law, especially respecting sedition and unlawful assembly, which, in times of unrest, have been interpreted with rigour. It was accepted law, in the seventeenth century, that any statement reflecting on the Government involved sedition; and this principle was applied as late as 1704, when the editor of the Observer was prosecuted for libel, because he had alleged that the Ministry was corrupt and the Navy ill managed. An extract from the charge to the jury of Lord Chief Justice Holt in that year gives a surprising view of the scope of this class of offence. He thus addressed the jury:

'To say that corrupt officers are appointed to administer affairs is certainly a reflection on the Government. If people should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the Government, no Government can subsist. For it is very necessary for all Governments that the people should have a good opinion of it. And nothing can be worse to any Government, than to endeavour to procure animosities as to the management of it; this has always been looked upon as a crime, and no Government can be safe without it be punished.'¹

There were frequent instances of prosecution for sedition and breach of the peace in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. Many of the Chartists were indicted for unlawful assembly, that is to say, for meeting in such a manner as to cause reasonable apprehension that the public peace would be endangered, and for sedition, or imperilling the security of the State.

In 1839 one Vincent, together with other persons, who were members of a local Working Men's Association, which became affiliated to the Chartist Convention, were indicted for seditious conspiracy and unlawful assembly. The judge, in directing the jury, pointed out that, if it was the purpose of the defendants to obtain the five points of the Charter by reasonable argument and petition, there was no breach of the law. But if they had sought to effect the changes by physical force an offence had been committed. No civilized society could exist if changes were to be effected by force. The jury found all the defendants guilty of attending unlawful assemblies, and two of them of uttering seditious language.¹

¹ R. v. Tutchin (1704), 14 State Trials, p. 1128.

Another Chartist, who was indicted and found guilty of making a seditious speech and for taking part in an unlawful assembly, had described the Government as too contemptible to be recognized and as one which ought to be overthrown. Chief Justice Wilde (afterwards Lord Chancellor Truro) pointed out that the right of public meeting was one of the most valuable of our institutions, as also was the public discussion of actual or supposed grievances. But if, he said, the meeting was called for the purpose of speaking and hearing seditious language—language exciting persons to violence and resistance of the law—‘there will be no doubt that the meeting is an illegal meeting, and that all that partook in the act of calling that meeting, and took part in those proceedings, which has such a tendency, will be guilty of an illegal meeting.’²

The present-day offence of sedition involves an intention

‘to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against the person of His Majesty, his heirs or successors, or the Government or Constitution of the United Kingdom, as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or the administration of justice or to excite His Majesty’s subjects to attempt, otherwise than by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in Church or State by law established, or to raise discontent or disaffection among His Majesty’s subjects, or to promote feelings of ill will and hostility between different classes of such subjects.’³

In other words, it is unlawful to attempt to overthrow the Constitution or to use such unlawful means as force to obtain the alteration of the law; but reasonable criticism of the actions of the Government or of the laws of the land does not come within the definition. ‘Every man has a right to give every public matter a candid, full and free discussion’, provided that he does not do it in a way to excite tumult.⁴ It is well known that, in normal practice, proceedings are not

¹ R. v. Vincent and others (1839), 3 State Trials, New Series, p. 1037.

² R. v. Fussell (1848), 6 State Trials, New Series, p. 723. See also R. v. Burns and others (1886), 16 Cox C.C. 355.

³ Stephen, Digest of Criminal Law, 7th ed., p. 93.

⁴ R. v. Collins (1899), 9 C. & P. 456.

taken immediately some impetuous agitator oversteps the limits of the legal definition. Broadly speaking, a revolutionary element must be manifest before a charge of sedition will be brought, though the degree of strictness in the enforcement of the law must almost necessarily vary according to the political conditions at any particular time. In a prosecution for sedition during the present century the judge described the proceedings as 'somewhat of a rarity'. It is of interest, too, that he informed the jury that they could take into account the state of public feeling.¹

The expression 'public meeting' has been statutorily defined as 'any meeting bona fide and lawfully held for a lawful purpose, and for the furtherance and discussion of a matter of public concern, whether the admission thereto be general or restricted'.² Short mention may be made of the scale of offences which apply when public meetings exceed the bounds of legality. A public meeting, designed for the purpose of making protests concerning the government of the State or of discussing changes in legislation will, if accompanied by a degree of tumultuousness calculated to excite alarm, become an unlawful assembly. It will be held, that is to say, to be an unlawful assembly when it has the effect of giving firm and courageous persons in the neighbourhood ground to apprehend a breach of the peace. Such an assembly will, as soon as its common purpose is put into effect, become a riot. The classic definition of the difference between a riot and an unlawful assembly is this:

'If the parties assemble in a tumultuous manner, and actually execute their purpose with violence, it is a riot, but if they merely meet upon a purpose, which, if executed, would make them rioters, and, having done nothing, separate without carrying their purpose into effect, it is an unlawful assembly.'³

If the purpose of an assembly includes an intention to interfere with and resist the free exercise by the Government of its lawful powers, if, that is to say, the intention is sufficiently general in its scope, those partaking in the assembly may commit high treason. 'Levying war against the King in his realm' is a head of the offence of high treason which has been broadly interpreted. It may cover an attempt to effect an alteration in the law by force, which does not correspond with the common description of war.

¹ R. v. Aldred (1909), 22 Cox C.C. 1.

² Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 64), s. 4.

³ R. v. Bird and others (1821), 5 C. & P. 154.

Until recently the provisions of the criminal law have been concerned with public meetings from the point of view of their possible danger to the community. But a few years ago a statute was passed which recognized the importance of protecting meetings for the free and undisturbed promotion and discussion of public questions. During the year or so preceding 1908 several political meetings, at which members of the Ministry were to make speeches, were interrupted by supporters of the women's suffrage movement. Chiefly owing, it may be presumed, to the disorders thus created, it was provided by an Act of Parliament¹ that 'any person who at a lawful public meeting acts in a disorderly manner for the purpose of preventing the transaction of the business for which the meeting was called together shall be guilty of an offence'. Not only, then, are persons punishable who misuse the right of public meeting to the danger of the State or of the public peace, but also those who interfere with that right, when it is being properly exercised.

§ 3. Political associations

The presentation of petitions and the holding of public meetings were often isolated acts, unco-ordinated with any general scheme. Political associations betoken a more highly developed capacity in members of the public to organize their efforts, in order to secure the objects which they desire to attain. These associations have been able to collect and distribute information, rally the scattered forces of public opinion, educate their present and prospective adherents, regulate the presentation of petitions and collaborate with each other.

The years 1779 and 1780 stand out as important dates in the history of political associations, as they also do in the histories of petitions and public meetings. Prior to those dates, the only instance worthy of notice in which these associations were active was connected with the invalidation of Wilkes's re-election. The Society for Supporting the Bill of Rights was formed under hopeful auspices; but it had a brief life, owing to its ultimate misuse by Wilkes's friends in the personal interests of the hero himself.

¹ Public Meetings Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII, c. 66).

The twenty-six county associations of 1779-80, however, included many very respectable people, eager to organize the presentation of petitions for inquiry into the expenditure on the war, and, later, for reform of the representation and for shorter Parliaments. They were largely due to the initiative of Christopher Wyvill of the Yorkshire Association, which was the first and foremost of these associations. The appointment by these associations of delegates to meet and concert common plans of action was the design of a Radical element in their membership. It aroused considerable suspicion, especially in Ministerial circles. Rockingham told Shelburne that 'discretion and correctness have not predominated'.¹ Horace Walpole wrote to Sir Horace Mann:

'The Opposition . . . affected to transfer parliamentary power to the associations, who were very ready to affect parliamentary airs, and accordingly assumed cognisance of matters actually pending in Parliament. This has offended moderate men; and many, who approved the petitions, were alarmed at the associations.'²

Freeholders of some of the counties actively disagreed with the policy of the twenty-six county associations and protested against their action. There was, for instance, a strongly supported protest from the County of Sussex, many of whose freeholders recorded that:

'We do most particularly protest against the resolutions of appointing a Committee of Correspondence, with the declared purpose of forming general associations apparently tending to overrule the legislature and to introduce measures inconsistent with and subversive of our present excellent Constitution.'

The county of Kent also was divided into two parties.³ How far these protests were instigated by agents of the Government it is impossible to say.

The county associations had the sympathy of Fox and Shelburne. Fox led the defence of the propriety of the appointment of delegates, in the face of those who contended that these proceedings were in derogation of the rights and dignity of Parliament, and who were, perhaps, apprehensive that the new representative organization might become a challenge to Parliament itself.⁴ Shelburne displayed his

¹ Fitzmaurice, Life of Lord Shelburne, vol. ii, pp. 73 ff.

² Horace Walpole's Letters (ed. Toynbee), vol. xi, p. 143.

³ Whitehall Evening Post, 12 to 15 Feb. 1780; 37 Commons Journals, p. 761.

⁴ 22 Parl. Hist. 97-8.

independent and advanced views and wrote: 'I cannot discover in the plan of the Yorkshire Association a single exceptional principle. General union is acknowledged to be essential to our success.'¹ And the younger Pitt, who was in a few years violently to oppose all political combinations, supported the activities of the associations that were interested in parliamentary reform, and enrolled himself as a member of the Society for Promoting Constitutional Information. When Pitt had produced his scheme of reform in 1785 and carried it to a division, the Yorkshire Association expressed itself as satisfied, and was dissolved in the following year.

The Protestant Association of that wild agitator, Lord George Gordon, does not throw much light on the development of political associations. But the lamentable occurrences of the uproar following the great meeting of 2 June 1780 led to a revulsion of popular feeling; and their formation became increasingly discredited.

Political associations based on class distinctions did not appear until the end of the eighteenth century. The first working-class association was the London Corresponding Society, which was founded in 1792 by Thomas Hardy. It was followed by other local corresponding societies. Their object was to secure parliamentary reform and adult suffrage; and, as their name implies, collaboration with each other was a leading feature in their organization. They existed chiefly to educate opinion; they eschewed any violent demonstrations; and, although they displayed republican sympathies, they could hardly be described as seditious. Nevertheless, the over-cautious attitude of the Government prompted the attempt to obtain Hardy's conviction in 1794. The allegation of constructive treason was not sustained. But in 1799 an Act was passed suppressing the London Corresponding Society by name and all similar associations.²

Excessive caution on the part of the Government was equally clearly shown by its attitude to the harmless Friends of the People, also founded in 1792, an association of moderate views, which favoured parliamentary reform and which was supported by Fox, Grey, Sheridan, Erskine, Whitbread, Lambton, Tierney, and others. It was characterized by Ministers as revolutionary and seditious. No doubt the Government's sense of proportion was warped by apprehension that there might appear in England organizations as powerful and subversive as the Jacobin Clubs in France.

¹ Fitzmaurice, Life of Shelburne, vol. iii, pp. 73 ff.

² 39 Geo. III, c. 47.

So far from showing signs of moderation after the peace of 1815, the governmental policy of repression was steadily pursued; and it renewed its vigour as a result of the agitation for Roman Catholic Emancipation. The Ministry decided that it must make every effort to check the activities of the Catholic Association, which had been formed by O'Connell in 1823 and which threatened to assume menacing dimensions. The gravamen of the charge against the association was that it threatened in its own sphere to compete with Parliament, and that its representative character constituted a challenge to the one body, which, it was said, was qualified and entitled to represent the people. A statute of 1817 evidenced the Government's suspicion of the appointment of delegates by political associations, for it enacted that any society electing delegates to meet with other societies or delegates should be deemed unlawful.¹

After failing to succeed in prosecuting O'Connell on a charge of directly inciting to rebellion, the Government took steps to suppress the organization itself. On 10 February 1825 the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Goulburn, introduced the Suppression of Unlawful Societies in Ireland Bill. The Bill was supported by Plunket, who had, on Grattan's death in 1820, become the foremost champion of Roman Catholic claims, and by Canning, who was a strong sympathizer with those claims. Plunket alleged that 'an association assuming to represent the people, and in that capacity to bring about a reform in Church and State, is directly contrary to the spirit of the British Constitution'. He expressly admitted the right of the people under a free constitution to meet for the purpose of promoting the redress of grievances by discussion or petition. But he denied that 'any portion of the subjects of this realm have a right to give up their suffrages to others—have a right to select persons to speak their sentiments, to debate upon their grievances, to devise measures for their removal, those persons not being recognized by law. This was the privilege alone of the Commons of the United Kingdom; and those who trespassed upon that privilege acted against the spirit of the British Constitution.'

¹ 57 Geo. III, c. 19, s. 25. This provision is still law, but is to a large extent treated as a dead letter, see Luby v. Warwickshire Miners' Association, [1912] 2 Ch. 371.

Canning's argument proceeded on similar lines.¹ The fear that the legislature might be endangered by the existence of some body, like the Catholic Association, with a representative organization was clearly very real; but the apprehensions of the Ministry were, it is obvious, stimulated by the evidences of unanimity of national feeling behind the Association.

The Anti-Slavery Association, which was formed in 1823, was political only in a limited sense. It might more properly be described as philanthropic; and it naturally did not arouse suspicions of seditious conspiracy when it organized a convention of delegates in London in 1833. Ministers received the delegates politely; and shortly afterwards the desired legislation was passed. This achievement was directly due to the vigorous campaign of the association. Stanley, in introducing the subject of abolition, opened with the remark that the increasing force of public opinion rendered it impossible to delay any longer the settlement of the question. He spoke of 'a growing determination on the part of the people of this country to put an end to slavery, which no one can deny or wisely despise'. It was, he said, a determination 'expressed in a voice so potential, that no Minister can venture to disregard it'.² The association is chiefly interesting, for the present purpose, because it provides an early instance of an elaborate and widespread effort to obtain general support for a project by educational methods. Never before had tracts been distributed on so vast a scale or the public support been so extensively canvassed.

Similar in some respects is the history of the Anti-Corn Law League, which was active between 1838 and 1846. It brought a vast educational campaign to a successful issue. But it was more intimately connected with home politics; and loud cries were raised by Protectionists for its suppression. Some of them even described it as a seditious conspiracy.

The organization of the Anti-Corn Law League reached a very high pitch. Meetings, with competent speakers, were arranged in every part of the country. The circulation of information marked a triumph of capacity and enthusiasm. In 1842-3 the League's methods of publicity reached heights which are astounding. Five million tracts were distributed to electors and nearly four million to non-electors. Nothing could stem the tide of progress of an organization such as this.

¹ 12 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 315, 316, 471.

² 17 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1194.

One of the methods adopted by the League was to obtain representation in Parliament for supporters of the campaign. Cobden and Bright were successful in bringing into the House a little band of Leaguers, not large enough to try conclusions with other parties, but capable of exercising an influence out of proportion to its size.

The Political Unions which agitated for Reform in 1831-2, many consisting exclusively of working-men, were little more than levies of the unrepsented who were prepared to urge a wider representation with every means available to them. A hundred and fifty thousand, for instance, met at Birmingham in November 1831, and threatened, like Hampden, to refuse to pay taxes. Meetings were vast and numerous, and many petitions were presented; but co-ordination was impeded by the repressive legislation regarding unlawful combinations which prohibited (and still prohibits) societies 'composed of different divisions or branches or of different parts'.¹ Nevertheless, the activities of these Unions aroused considerable uneasiness in the Ministry; and there was consequently issued, in November 1831, a Proclamation which declared them to be illegal and unconstitutional. Among those responsible for the issue of this Proclamation, there were some who had a few years earlier had intimate relations with similar organizations. But the Proclamation was only a timorous precaution; and its terms were not enforced.

When Reform was an accomplished fact, it was found by the working-men that they had been cruelly deceived. The effect of the Reform Bill was not what they had expected. It was obvious that further agitation would be necessary if their ideals were to be realized. There is, then, a connexion between the Political Unions of 1831-2 and the Chartist agitation, which opened in 1838. And the Chartists suffered from the same disabilities in regard to their organization as did their predecessors. The law made it difficult for them to maintain a centralized body with branch societies. The hopeless endeavour to press forward a national programme, with local societies linked only by the visits of leaders and speakers, soon drove the Chartists to form secret leagues, in respect of which prosecutions for high treason followed. But it was found possible in 1840 to form a National Charter Association to assist in centralizing the movement; up till then, apart from the efforts of leaders, the nearest approach to a head-quarters was the Convention or meeting of delegates.

¹ 39 Geo. III, c. 79, s. 2.

The first Convention, which met on 4 February 1839, with about fifty delegates, had as its chief object the presentation of a giant petition, though there were some who advocated more drastic methods. The attitude of a section of the Chartists towards Parliament, as displayed at the Convention, was one of challenge. Some of the delegates imagined that they were entitled to deal with Parliament on equal terms. They said that they were really more representative of the people than members of Parliament; and they wrote the letters 'M.C.' after their names, signifying 'Member of Convention'. When a resolution was passed that delegates should wait on members of Parliament and endeavour to induce them to support the National Petition and the terms of the Charter, a few of them protested that this would imply a recognition of the House of Commons as true representatives of the people. No doubt this element of challenge, coupled with the suspicion that one of these Conventions would claim to supersede Parliament and bring about a revolution, alienated a large class of potential sympathizers.

The failure to secure any immediate result from the Chartist agitation, which finally ceased in 1848, must be ascribed as much to divided counsels, faulty leadership, and legal obstacles to efficient organization as to causes inherent in the objects of the campaign. The confinement of the movement to one class and the absence of any real representation of supporters in Parliament also played their part. After the fight for further reform was renewed in 1866, the successful outcome could not be claimed by the National Reform League (a working-class body) alone. The National Reform Union, which consisted mainly of middle-class Radicals, was also striving for similar ends. This Union had means of influencing the legislature, which the League had not; and it subsequently survived as an auxiliary of the Liberal Party.

Since mid-Victorian times political associations have multiplied and flourished. It would be possible, if this were the suitable place, to describe the activities of a dozen of them which have played an important part in the history of the last hundred years. It is enough to remark here that they have ranged, in the character of their concerns, from the Fabian Society, supporting socialism, to the Women's Social and Political Union, supporting women's suffrage. Many voluntary associations, too, whose objects have been the amelioration of social and industrial conditions, have helped to bridge the transition from individualism to socialism in its widest sense.

In the second half of the nineteenth century local political associations, formed chiefly for the purpose of organizing and supporting parliamentary candidatures, grew up universally within the ranks of the great parties. In this guise the political association comes under the heading of party organization, and, as such, is reserved for mention in the second part of Chapter VI. Trade unions, however, although they developed political activities, in addition to industrial and social activities, some fifty years ago, remained distinct from party organization until the advent of the Labour Representation Committee of 1900.

Trade unionism, in its political aspects, has not been open to the same disadvantages as those which handicapped the working-class bodies of the earlier nineteenth century. Whereas the failure of the Chartists was largely due to lack of organization and lack of influence in Parliament, the trade unions have succeeded in paying attention to both these factors. The first Trade Union Congress, which developed out of the local trade councils, was held in 1868. It now meets annually. Its executive work was at first performed by a Parliamentary Committee and later by a General Council. This political executive of the movement was not able at first to do much more than arrange deputations to Ministers in support of resolutions of the Congress; and only subsequently was it able to act as an efficient co-ordinating body and to have a real influence on legislation affecting the working-classes.

The early Labour members of Parliament, mostly nominees of trade unions, did not, like the Anti-Corn Law Leaguers, stand aloof from all parties. They formed a group, which attached itself to the Liberals; but in 1900, as a result of a resolution of the Trade Union Congress, the Labour Representation Committee or Labour party came into being. The Labour party rapidly developed into a fully efficient political instrument of the trade union movement; and the Trade Union Congress and its executive became to some extent an auxiliary organization. Indeed, it is regarded by some as an anomaly, if not a superfluity, since the periodical Labour party Conferences necessarily cover much the same ground as the Trade Union Congress. At the present time the Labour party and the Trade Union Congress work side by side in close co-operation. They have their joint departments for publicity, information, and research; joint meetings of the executives of the Trade Union Congress and the Labour party; and a National Joint Council representing the Trade Union Congress, the Party Executive, and Labour members of Parliament.

From the time that trade unions, as political associations, come within the organization of a recognized political party—the unions themselves are members of the Labour party—they cease to be the concern of the present chapter; but a few words may be added regarding the declaration of strikes and lock-outs for the purpose of influencing public opinion and the government of the country.

The Labour party and the trade unions are in the peculiar situation of not merely representing individuals, but of representing industries; in this respect they are placed in a position of great power; and they have been able to use this power to threaten the Government that labour conditions would be disorganized unless their views were adopted. For instance, in 1920, when it was feared that the Government might involve Great Britain in a Russo-Polish war, the Trade Union Congress, jointly with the Labour party, formed a council of action and held out menaces of 'any and every form of withdrawal of labour which circumstances may require', in the event of any and every form of military and naval intervention against the Soviet Government. Fortunately this action did not prove necessary.

In 1926 the Trade Union Congress organized a general strike in connexion with a dispute in a particular industry; and in the following year legislation was passed dealing with the relation of strikes to the safety of the State. The Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act, 1927, declared strikes to be illegal which have any object other than or in addition to the furtherance of a trade dispute within the trade or industry in which the strikers are engaged, and which are designed or calculated to coerce the Government either directly or by inflicting hardship upon the community. Lock-outs are also declared illegal in similar circumstances.

Associations of employers of labour, of which there are many, have no party in Parliament to represent them; they have, therefore, to use such means as they can, by communicating with members, to influence Parliament in regard to objects in which they are interested. There are, too, a variety of political associations that are concerned to influence Parliament in favour of objects that cut across the ordinary party divisions. There are such organizations as the Proportional Representation Society, the Free Trade Union, and others of a similar kind. Again, there are a large number of voluntary associations whose objects can hardly be described as political, which from time to time make representations to Parliament or to Ministers on the subject of legislation, bodies interested in philanthropic and scientific matters. 'Some of the most creative political proposals in modern democracy originate, not with the Government, nor with the permanent civil service, but with public-minded voluntary groups, who have a public concern for this or that problem and who have thought out a remedy for it.'¹ An early and outstanding instance of the product of this class is the Anti-Slavery legislation of the early nineteenth century, following on the agitation already mentioned. It is, moreover, an accepted principle in modern legislative practice for Government Departments that are charged with the preparation of Bills to consult interested bodies on matters in which they have special knowledge, and in which they will be able to assist in rendering the proposed legislation practicable.²

The risk of political associations, wielding an influence in excess of parties and to the detriment of the party system and overbearing the people by the disproportionate use of force or of money, has not at present loomed very large in this country. It has been maintained that the organization of the Trade Union Congress has taken excessive advantage of its influential position. If this is true, it provides an example of the influence of sheer numbers. As regards money, it is easy to see that if, for instance, the Anti-Corn Law League had been more largely supported than it was by a number of wealthy persons, it might have secured its ends regardless of what were the real opinions of the majority of the people.

¹ A. D. Lindsay, The Essentials of Democracy, pp. 39-40.

² See p. 68 above.

But the undue influence of political associations has, according to some views, been observable in recent years in the United States of America. The Dry Amendment has been quoted as an instance. There are many who think that the introduction of Prohibition was forced on the party in power by the Anti-Saloon League, whose vast funds enabled it to employ overwhelming propaganda.

CHAPTER V

PARTIES AND THE PEOPLE

§ 1. The growth of parties

(a) Under the Stuarts.

PROFESSOR LOWELL has defined 'the essential function of parties and the true reason of their existence' as 'the bringing of public opinion to a focus and the framing of issues for popular verdict'. There are some who scoff at the practicability of these ideals being realized. But it can hardly be denied that, without parties, the people would have taken an even smaller part than they have in determining political issues during the last hundred years. Although some incidents in the history of the development of parties encourage the student to condemn the system roundly as dictated by selfish and sectional interests, it would be a mistake to disparage the party system, because it has had in many respects a disreputable record, and because it has shown itself capable of abuse. Democratic government, in this country at least, is dependent on its maintenance, a consideration which critics are inclined to overlook.

It was a long time before the fundamental justification of the system, namely, the promotion of democratic government, came to be recognized. At first, sides were taken merely in order to overcome adversaries, often with little or no regard for the wishes of the people at large. They were opponents in the sense of antagonists, imbued with animosity. The same tendencies had previously expressed themselves in the blood feud and the private war. But, in modern times, party divisions have subserved the general interest, so that parties now stand in opposition to each other in a more enlightened sense of that term. They represent policies which can be put alternatively to the electorate; and the electorate is placed in a more favourable position to make its choice effective.

Even in the beginnings of their history, parties in Parliament had their counterparts in the people; but the people were not in a position to decide which party should furnish the Ministry, much less to decide what the Ministry should do. Parliamentary or majority government was not to be operative for many years to come. The Sovereign still remained, as it were, the head of the Ministry; and the role of members of Parliament was not to support one Ministry or prospective Ministry in opposition to another, but, even in Stuart times, was largely confined to carrying out the King's requirements and providing him with funds.

Speculations regarding the precise date at which parties may be said definitely to have emerged are unessential for the present purpose. The period leading up to the Commonwealth and the later years of Charles II have both been taken as the approximate starting-point of organized divisions in Parliament; at neither of these times was there a difference of principle between parties in the sense which is understood to-day. At these early periods the issue was one between Royalists and Parliamentarians, or between the Court and the Country parties; it was, that is to say, a question rather between King and Parliament than between two equally ranked groups of members.¹ This may be gathered from the use of the expressions 'Court' and 'Country', which imply that the relations of the parties were unlike those of the present day. The one had all the influence of the head of the State behind it and relied on that advantage more than on an appeal to the people; the other looked to some extent towards the people for support.

Soon after 1675, when controversy on ecclesiastical matters began to make clearer the division into two parties, which were to be known as Tories and Whigs, there were, indeed, some differences of principle apparent. But the reactionary attitude of Charles II, and, later, the sheer despotism of James II, caused these principles to be obscured by the pressing and universal topic of constitutional government and the freedom of the subject. The problem of the King's prerogative largely monopolized the political stage. It is true that the elections of 1679 and 1681 were remarkable for a sudden manifestation of party electioneering activity; but the political issues were largely concerned with the maintenance of a free constitution.

The Country party applied the most effective sanctions that were available to it in order to defeat Charles II's autocratic exploits. He was threatened that, unless he promised his assent to the Exclusion Bill, to the independence of judges and to other concessions, the people would not be encouraged to contribute to his service. The Court party paid but slight attention to the people. No general effort was made on behalf of the King to capture constituencies. The second Earl of Clarendon wrote, for instance, during the election of 1681, that several gentlemen in the County of Hants were anxious to serve the King 'if they knew which way to do it, but they knew not from whom to take their aim. They expected (I know not why) a declaration from the King and then other members would be sent to Parliament'.¹ In fact, the question of religion cut across political issues; and the threat of the introduction of Roman Catholicism as the established religion led many of the normal supporters of the Court to remain neutral.

¹ Cf. David Hume, Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary (ed. T. H. Green and T. H. Grose), vol. i, p. 141. 'But 'tis almost impossible, that the attachment of the Court party to monarchy should not degenerate into an attachment to the monarch; there being so close a connexion between them, and the latter being so much more the natural object.'

Doubtless the Court party was unable altogether to neglect to cultivate popular support as a means of maintaining its position. When, at the end of 1679, the Country party encouraged petitions from the people for the due assembling of Parliament, the King's friends endeavoured to neutralize the effect of these petitions by obtaining addresses expressing 'abhorrence' of the action of the petitioners. The famous Petitioners and Abhorrrers have been pointed out as marking a stage in the formation of parties among the people; but, in so far as their action was spontaneous, they were rather expressive of a division between the supporters of the King's prerogative and the upholders of the rights of Parliament than of the differences between two alternative parties in Parliament.

The high-handed policy of James II still more effectively put party divisions in abeyance. He succeeded in alienating the sympathies of the incipient Tory party and in ranging it, as well as the Country party, against him. As soon as he left the throne the two parties resumed to some extent the opposition to each other which had begun to be a trait of political life. The accession of William III, however, while removing the fear of unduly autocratic government, did much to disorganize the pre-existing political professions. Convulsions in politics have frequently caused a disintegration of parties into groups; and the Revolution was an instance of this process.² It

'had shattered the old Tory basis, and largely destroyed the

¹ Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1680-1, p. 165.

² The Parliament which met in Mar. 1690 was described to Harley as divided into Tories, Whigs, Court Whigs, and Tory Whigs. Hist. MSS. Comm. 14th Report, Appendix, Part II, MSS. of Duke of Portland, vol. iii, p. 446.

rationale of the Whigs. The first were drawn by their political reason to support the Crown, but by their sentiment to hate usurpation and Dutch wars. The Whigs, if they were to be true to their past, would be jealous of a kingly rule, but they dared not overturn the saviour of Whig society. Purely religious scruples were losing their strength and being absorbed in factional political systems, but these scruples, too, in so far as they operated at all, diverted each party from the natural course of their affections.¹

Thus it was that for some years many politicians did not find a congenial home in either of the old camps; and this situation persisted into the reign of Queen Anne, during which many eminent statesmen passed gradually from one side in politics to the other. Groups formed and reformed themselves into loosely constructed parties. Professor Trevelyan quotes a contemporary observer, who, in 1702, divided members of Parliament as follows: 'Churchmen, High-Churchmen, Low Church, Non-Conformists, Courtiers, and Sneakers.'² Again, a pamphleteer, writing in 1712, described the parties at that date as 'Whig, Tory, Old Ministry, New Ministry, Hot Whigs, High Fliers, October Club, Moderate Men, Old Whigs, Modern Whigs, and such like'.³ It is obvious that, if these descriptions are at all near the truth, the process of reassortment must have precluded the possibility of popular issues being elucidated by the action of parties.

Even in so far as members were divided into the two ranks of Whigs and Tories, party discipline was largely non-existent in the House of Commons. In the reign of William III many Whigs maintained an independent attitude and did not feel themselves bound to support those in office who went under the same description as themselves. In the early part of the reign of Queen Anne the High Tories displayed a detached attitude towards the so-called Tory Ministry. In both reigns the presence of the leading Ministers in the House of Lords encouraged in the Lower House a disposition towards freedom of action, partly because of the absence of control and partly because of the feeling of jealousy which still prevailed between the two Houses.

The first instinct of William III on coming to the throne

¹ K. Feiling, History of the Tory Party, p. 275.

² G. M. Trevelyan, England under Queen Anne, vol. i, p. 213.

³ The Conduct of Parties in England, &c., 1712.

was to employ one or two Tory Ministers, as well as Whigs, so as to secure the united support of Parliament in his struggle against France. He saw a House of Commons which had gained for itself a decisive position in the government of the country; and he may well have thought that a body of Ministers reflecting the various political leanings of the House would best secure its support. But, in the middle period of his reign, William III, acting under the influence of Sunderland, experimented with a one-party Ministry. For many months before the 1695 election the Ministry was made more and more Whig; and the 'jingo' election of 1695 may be regarded as an early example of an appeal to the people on party lines, an appeal which met with the desired response, namely, the return of a Whig majority. Shortly afterwards, the tide of popular opinion turned in the Tory direction; and William was not prepared to do more than conciliate the Tories. There was a reversion to the system of mixed Ministries, which continued until Queen Anne had been reigning four or five years.

A homogeneous Ministry was again in office near the year 1708. On this occasion it was not the consequence of an experiment on the part of the Sovereign, but of the machinations of the Whigs. Queen Anne acted, when free to exercise her own predilections, under the conviction that mixed Ministries were preferable to those chosen from one side or the other in politics. She was constantly apprehensive of being enslaved by party.¹ As a result of pressure applied by Godolphin and Marlborough, and of the stratagems of the Whigs, she was induced to replace Tory Ministers by Whigs, so as to produce a Ministry of Whig persuasion. In 1710 the Sacheverell incident came as a godsend to the Queen, and she was able to free herself from the domination of the Whigs. Though not yet wholly converted to the wisdom of party government, the Queen must be taken, by her attitude at the elections of 1713, to have shown a definite preference for a Tory régime.

Towards the end of her reign, there were signs of the party

¹ 'All I desire', she said, 'is my liberty in encouraging and employing all . . . that concur faithfully in my service, whether they are called Whigs or Tories, not to be tied to one or the other, for if I should be so unfortunate as to fall into the hands of either, I shall look upon myself, though I have the name of Queen, to be in reality but their slave, which, as it will be my personal ruin, so it will be the destroying of all government, for instead of putting an end to faction it will lay a lasting foundation for it.' (Hist. MSS. Comm. 9th Report, Appendix, pp. 471-2.)

system assumed the outlines of its modern shape. The Whig Junto provided an example of a close-knit political organization; and, by 1711, the Whig party, with Walpole as its leader in the House of Commons, began to develop into something similar to a modern Opposition. At the beginning of 1714 Queen Anne was induced by Bolingbroke, who played upon her feelings by suggesting that the Whigs were anxiously awaiting her demise, openly to reject the policy of enlisting both parties at the same time in the service of the Crown. Even if the Hanoverian accession had not involved the employment of a Ministry comprised of adherents of one political party, it is probable that the experiences of the reign of Queen Anne would have led to this arrangement proving inevitable. The coalitions of which she had been so fond in principle proved both ineffective and troublesome. Indeed, the period of the later Stuarts is largely notable, in the constitutional sphere, as one in which unsuccessful experiments were made in checking the development of the party system towards its logical outcome.

The employment of mixed Ministries by the Sovereign necessarily delayed the development of the party system. The electorate, in so far as it could be regarded as having any kind of alternative before it which was likely to enable it to make its influence felt, was limited to that of supporting or rejecting Ministers chosen by the Crown, whether they, as a body, represented any party or policy or not. But, in fact, the opportunity of supporting or rejecting the Ministers was hardly existent. There was a considerable body of members of Parliament (perhaps about a fifth part) who were the paid servants of the Crown and therefore the assured adherents of the Ministry of the day, irrespective of the composition of that Ministry. The 'tied' character of these votes restricted the representatives of the people in their freedom to have their views reflected in the formation of the Government. The existence of a body of King's or Queen's 'friends' or 'servants' in the first place obscured, and in the second place limited, the real usefulness of the nascent party divisions. 'I take it for granted', wrote Harley to Godolphin in 1705, 'that no party in the House can carry it for themselves without the Queen's servants join with them; that the foundation is: persons or parties are to come to the Queen, and not the Queen to them.'¹

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., MSS. of Margus of Bath, vol. i, p. 74.

(b) Under the Hanoverians.

The Court party remained a powerful force in politics during the reign of George I.¹ Moreover, after his accession, the complete ascendancy of the Whig party effectively set back the progress towards majority government. There could be no alternative choice with but one party in the position to assume office. It was necessary to wait until Walpole had alienated the sympathies of a section of his followers, and until he had quarrelled with Pulteney in 1725, before there appeared any body which could fairly be regarded as an Opposition.² A few years earlier, William Shippen, the leader of the Jacobite squires, although having some claim to being a pioneer of parliamentary opposition, was handicapped by the smallness of his forces and the forlorn nature of his cause from ever showing any promise of providing an alternative Ministry. But the contest between Walpole's party and that of his opponents had little relation to the ideal party system. Public spirit was at a low ebb; faction was rife; and there were no permanent principles to which the main antagonists adhered. Indeed, Chesterfield, in advocating an administration embracing opposing parties, hardly exaggerated when he alleged that there was no distinction in principle between them.³

And yet there were some rudiments of parliamentary government recognizable at the end of Walpole's Ministry. Walpole had more than once enunciated the principle of the corporate responsibility of the Ministry. It was advanced by him as early as 1733, when he experienced insubordination among his colleagues in connexion with the Excise Scheme. Although the principle was not accepted in its entirety for some years to come, not until the last years of the century, the realization of even the beginnings of the principle was a definite step in the direction of an ideal relation between parties and people.

The Opposition to Walpole had no real cohesion. At the time of the election of 1741 and the period which immediately followed it the Opposition, which had drawn together fairly steadily during the previous ten or fifteen years under the influence of men like Chesterfield, Argyll, and Bolingbroke, proved to be by no means a homogeneous body. A few days before Walpole's resignation in February 1742, it was felt that some sections of the Opposition were ready to make terms with him.

¹ See, for instance, Hist. MSS. Comm., Stuart Papers, vols. v and vi, passim.

² An interesting account of the beginning and development of the opposition against Walpole, written by Arthur Onslow, Speaker of the House of Commons, is to be found in Hist. MSS. Comm., 14th Report, Appendix, Part IX, pp. 458 ff.

³ Old England, or the Constitutional Journal, No. 3; see also an article entitled, 'The Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Political Opposition', in the London Journal for 2 Oct. 1731.

'It is generally agreed', said an observer, 'that Sir Robert will never give up, nor bring anybody in, if he can possibly avoid it; that the Tories would come into any terms; and that the patriots being sensible of that, are so afraid of being left in the lurch, that they only wait for the first good offer . . . Pulteney's terms seem to be a peerage and a place in the cabinet council, if he can get it.'¹

Walpole's loss of office was caused as much by defections from his own ranks as by the organized efforts of the Opposition. Jealousy and a craving for official emoluments were largely responsible for the fall of the great Minister. The new administration consisted partly of members of the so-called Opposition and partly of the old Ministers. No appreciable share was taken by the people in effecting the change.²

Nor was the régime of intrigue and venality which existed under the Pelhams and the Whig families productive of party principles. In 1751 Horace Walpole said that 'all was faction, and splitting into little factions. . . . The Prince's Court, composed of the refuse of every party, was divided into twenty small ones Opposition . . . and even the distinction of parties having in a manner ceased at this period! . . . All were now sunk in a dull mercenary subjection to two brothers.'³

Opposition was spasmodic, personal, and ineffective; and, by the end of the reign of George II, the Whig oligarchy had managed so to entrench themselves that the King was no longer free to choose his Ministers at will. George II, although not imbued with such ambitious notions as his successor in regard to the personal ascendancy of the Sovereign, did not, as has sometimes been supposed, fail to take a lively interest in election campaigns. He watched their progress closely; and he exercised a constant influence over the choice of candidates and the expenditure of money. He did not, however, avoid painful reminders of the limitations which had come to surround the position of the Crown since the beginning of the new dynasty. It had been Lord Granville's maxim: 'give any man the Crown on his side and he can defy everything';¹ and in reliance on this principle he advised the King so to treat his Ministry in February 1746, that they resigned in a body and forced the King to recall them, much to his embarrassment, two days later. The Whigs had secured the Hanoverian dynasty, but at the cost to that dynasty of the realities of power.

¹ Letter of Sir Robert Wilmot to the Duke of Devonshire, 12 Jan. 1742, printed in Cox, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. III, p. 587.

² See pp. 113, 160, below; and see article entitled, 'Reasons for a steady Opposition', in the Westminster Journal, 26 Mar. 1743.

³ Horace Walpole, Memoirs of the Reign of George II (ed. Holland), vol. I, pp. 47, 228.

Immediately on his accession George III set himself to regain the independence of the Crown; and, for this purpose, he attempted to procure the aid of Tory puppets. Thus there arose a semblance of a standing difference of principles between the two parties. On the Whig side, it was said that the Ministry should depend on the majority in the House of Commons; and the Whigs lost no opportunity, however unscrupulous, of securing that majority. On the Court side, it was said that the King should have freedom to direct the government of the country. But there were still many members on both sides who were imbued with the idea that it was due to the King to support his efforts to carry on the business of the nation; and support of the King's Ministers, regardless of party, was considered to be 'a duty while an honest man could support it'.² It was not until parties became more adequately organized that the traditional obligation to support the King's Government, as such, fell into decay. Even as late as the early nineteenth century there were many members of Parliament who thought that it was not their province to question the King's choice of his advisers. They held that at least a fair trial should be given to any Ministry before supporting a vote of non-confidence.

George III did not imagine that he could govern in permanent opposition to a parliamentary majority; but he did all he could to interfere with the development of the party system. The elder Pitt, without realizing that he was so doing, to some extent played into the King's hands by his refusal to countenance party connexions and by his preference of 'measures' to 'men'. This attitude is evidenced by his repeated refusals to join the Rockingham Ministry and by his welcome by the King, in 1766, as the Minister who would disembarass him from the shackles of party.¹ If Chatham did not, as Wilkes asserted to the younger Pitt several years later, 'annihilate' party, he at least did a great deal to check its beneficial development. Horace Walpole mentioned 'his known desire of uniting, that was breaking, all parties'.²

¹ Letters of Horace Walpole (ed. Toynbee), vol. ii, p. 59.

² Lord Barrington to A. Mitchell, 13 Dec. 1762; Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 6834, f. 42, quoted by L. B. Namier, England in the Age of the American Revolution, vol. i, p. 58.

It was to a large extent due to the personal efforts and contrivances of George III that the Crown servants and adherents were sufficiently large in numbers in the House of Commons to assist him in turning a working majority in his favour.³ After some ignominious experiences of Whig domination, he succeeded, by skilful management and by the assistance of the younger Pitt, in freeing himself from the control of the Whig oligarchs and in gaining some measure of the independence for which he had striven. The notable defeat, however, of the Whig families as a result of the election of 1784 was not secured by party issues being laid before the electorate. The victory of Pitt was due more to the dislike of the Fox-North coalition Ministry and the machinations of the agents of the Crown than to the attitude of the people respecting any question of policy, though the alarm raised over Fox's East India Bill provided something of a standard by which the political situation could be judged. Nor must it be supposed that the average voter in 1784 had any clear notion of voting for or against the freedom of the Crown to direct the course of government.⁴

There followed, after the year 1784, the long period of Pitt's administration, during which the pre-eminence and ascendancy of the Minister and the alternate factiousness and disunity of the Opposition left little room for the development of the better features of the party system. During the years leading up to the Reform Bill of 1832, the looming of big problems caused a shuffling of groups from one party to another. The chief causes of the disintegration apparent in 1822 were, first, the divisions of opinion on both Catholic Emancipation and Parliamentary Reform and, secondly, the ⁴ See pp. 106-8 below.

¹ Chatham Correspondence, vol. iii, p. 21.

² Walpole, Memoirs of George III, vol. i, p. 15.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), pp. 538, 633, Selwyn to Lord Carlisle, Nov. 1781 and July 1782.

distrust of Canning as a leader by a section of the Tories. In the spring of 1827 Canning's Government included Liberal Tories, such as Palmerston, as well as a few Whigs. The two great parties were each divided into two. It was not until 1830, when the Liberal Tories, with the exception of Peel, joined the reformers, that a return was made to a two-party system, if, indeed, it can be said to have previously existed. It may, perhaps, be contended that party principles were for the first time laid alternatively before the people in 1831. The great triumph of the election of that year was the acquisition by the people of the power to decide upon issues advanced by organized parties, or, rather, by parties which were beginning to be organized for the purpose of 'framing of issues for popular verdict'.

The way in which the development of party organization, after 1831, influenced the constitutional position of the people is discussed in the next chapter. The best use, however, of that organization was hindered, at first, by a failure to appreciate fully the tenet secured by the events connected with the passing of the great Reform Bill and, later, by interruptions in the working of the two-party system. The Conservative party was disunited, as a result of Peel's conversion to the abolition of the Corn Laws. For some twenty years following 1846 such issues as were recognizable were personal rather than party ones. Greville hardly exaggerated when, writing in 1854, he said that there was 'a total dissolution of party ties and obligations';¹ and Morley, when discussing the defeat of the second Derby Government of 1859, described the situation as being one of 'desperate confusion among leaders, parties, and groups'.² The period of rivalry, however, between Disraeli and Gladstone was not only one in which the two-party system operated with some degree of usefulness, but was also one in which the improvement of party organization began to influence the definition of issues.³

§ 2. Some handicaps

(a) Faction, real or supposed.

The most cursory sketch of the relation of parties to the framing of issues should include mention of the views which have been held regarding degeneration of party into faction.

¹ Journal of Reign of Queen Victoria, 1852-60, vol. i, pp. 180-1.

² Life of Gladstone, vol. i, p. 621.

³ See Chapter VI, § 2.

For many years after the beginning of the activities of parties, it was frequently alleged by those out of office that the administration was based on party for the purpose of advancing private interests; and, by those in office, that opposition was carried on for opposition's sake.

'Tis a miserable circumstance, and the general ruin of prosperous states,' said a writer of a tract of the time of William III, 'when parties out of separate interests and passions pursue different ends of their own, without regard to the public, although the chief interest of each; but it is a circumstance beyond common misery, a propensity to ruin more than natural and a fatality in mankind, greater than has been ever observed perhaps in any country or set of men, that they should be divided into parties from the public interest, when there is not so much as any real particular interest in effect, carrying on in any of those different parties. . . .'¹

It is to be noted that, in discussions relating to party government before the nineteenth century, the term 'party' is often used as synonymous with 'connexion' or 'interest'. It had, that is to say, a narrower connotation than it has to-day. Frequently, writers of the eighteenth century refer to the Tory and Whig 'interest' as alternative to 'party'. The use is significant.

Bolingbroke's advocacy of a truce to party government at the time of Walpole's ascendancy was in itself obviously based on personal interest; but he showed precocity, in his insistence on the necessity of principle as the justification of party government. He maintained that, during the reign of George II, principles were in abeyance; he pointed to the practical settlement of the question of the succession to the throne; and he argued that Walpole was organizing his party merely as a pretext for monopolizing office.

On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that, during a large part of the eighteenth century, any form of organized opposition was suspected and discredited as being factious. Ministers frequently characterized those who opposed them as 'the Faction'. In 1757 Newcastle made proposals to Hardwicke with the object of arranging for the organization of an Opposition. But Hardwicke expressed himself as shocked at the notion of a 'formed general opposition'; and Newcastle felt bound to withdraw his suggestions and to fall into agreement with Hardwicke's views.

¹ The State of Parties and of the Public (State Tracts published during the reign of William III, vol. ii, p. 208).

At an early stage in his career the elder Pitt evinced an aversion to party. The reasoning which appealed to him was positive as well as negative. He saw the advantage of a national and unified Government, comprising all the available talent, and he also realized the dangers and disadvantages of faction. He failed, for many years at least, to see that the defect of the parties of his time was not that they played too large a part, but that they did not play their part in an enlightened way; that, if parties could offer alternative party principles or programmes, the people would have greater freedom and more efficient government than they would under a system which involved competition between the King and the Whig families.

The views of Pitt on this one subject coincided, as has been remarked, with those of George III, who aimed at autocratic rule and desired to be untrammelled by majority government. When he appointed Pitt to office in 1766, he told him that he relied on his giving 'his aid towards destroying all party distinctions'. Pitt did not see that 'the evil to be feared was not the usurpation of oligarchy, but the restoration of the personal power of the Crown. Without the organization which the party system alone could give, the unreformed House of Commons lay at the mercy of the occupant of the throne.'¹

The critical situation regarding popular liberties which arose in 1770 induced Chatham, it seems, to modify his interpretation of the value of party government and to realize that any gain in the competence of the Ministry secured by non-party government was outweighed by the impairment of the free choice of the people. The 'state of the nation' required new remedies; and Chatham showed some signs of wishing to form an alliance with the Rockingham Whigs in opposition to the Ministry which had brought the country to a serious pass. It required, however, the insight of Burke to affirm that 'party divisions, whether on the whole operating for good or evil, are things inseparable from free government'. In his Thoughts on Present Discontents, which appeared at the time of Chatham's hesitation respecting the advisability of party government, Burke, while admitting 'the narrow, bigotted, and proscriptive spirit' and other dangers of the system, argued that it was incumbent on politicians to adopt the course that was essential to freedom and not to fly from it because of 'the evils attendant upon it'. He repudiated the notion, which he said had been inculcated by unconstitutional statesmen, that party and faction were 'equivalent terms', and he asserted that adherents to party, while not slavishly following their leaders in every particular circumstance, would be able to subscribe to the 'great leading general principles' of their parties 'at nine times out of ten'.

¹ Winstanley, Lord Chatham and the Whig Opposition, pp. 31-2.

Chatham was not by any means the last notable politician who failed to see party as the instrument of democracy. No one was more enthusiastic than Brougham for the acquisition by the people of a share in government; and he devoted much energy to the diffusion of information among them with this end in view. Yet he held the curious opinion that the party system represented but a stage—and an undesirable one—in the development of a democracy, which should be unhampered by selfishness and faction. He, like Chatham, had observed the perversion of party by the Whig families, and had concluded that faction and party were necessarily inseparable.

It is sometimes alleged that, under the party system as at present in vogue, no initiative is allowed to the people and that they are dragged at the heels of professional politicians or even of self-seeking schemers. To this it may be answered that electors, who have issues placed before them by a limited number of public-spirited parties, are much more able to express a decisive opinion on the choice of Ministers and policy than under forms of government in which there are elaborate arrangements for popular intervention in politics. In the United States, the party system has suffered for long periods from absence of settled principles. Bryce, in his American Commonwealth, contrasted the position of the United States with that of this country. He regarded the absence of faction as a notable feature of the working of the party system in England. The principle of the maintenance of law and order and existing institutions, on the one hand, and the principle of freedom and progress, on the other, have, in the opinion of Bryce, been steadily brought into operation by the issues raised, so that they have predominated on the whole over the selfish element which is liable to creep into party politics.¹

¹ 3rd, American, edition, 1900, vol. ii, p. 22.

This is, perhaps, a somewhat optimistic judgement, especially if it is meant to cover the period prior, say, to Victorian times. The opposite view has been strongly expressed by Treitschke. 'The conflict between the two great English political parties', he said, 'has never been one of principles, as Macaulay thought it, but always turned upon who should hold the chief power in the State.'¹ Whatever the truth may be, there is surely the consolation that, if the two great parties had given way altogether to a system of groups, self-interest and intrigue would undoubtedly have played even a larger part than they did.

At various stages in the nineteenth century and also in very recent times, there has been displayed an absence, on many sides, of appreciation of the advantages of the maintenance of the two-party system. The fluctuations in the opinions of Queen Victoria on this subject are typical of those of many of her subjects. She wrote, for instance, to her uncle at the time of the break-up of parties in the middle of the nineteenth century: 'One thing is pretty certain—that out of the present state of confusion and discordance, a sound state of parties will be obtained, and two parties, as of old, will again exist, without which it is impossible to have a strong government.'² On the other hand, she wrote on 7 October 1884, when the two parties were at a deadlock regarding the Reform Bill: 'I do wish there was some patriotism instead of Party, Party, in all this painful question. I long for the moderates of both sides to form a third party which would be a check to both the others and prevent this mischief the violent are making.'³

Difficulty in distinguishing issues, owing to the rapid development of a third party, has been experienced in recent times. Fortunately, there has remained evident in the past a steady propensity to return to two-party government. It has been found that there are generally two conspicuous sides to a question of policy rather than three or more. Disintegration into groups has proved but temporary; and, after a period of dislocation, during which the people have been handicapped in exercising a discrimination between policies, two parties have reappeared and the system has recovered its main capacity for usefulness.

¹ Heinrich von Treitschke, Politics (trans. 1916), vol. 1, p. 145. Cf. David Hume, Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary (ed. Green and Grose), vol. 1, p. 130, where he speaks of parties from principle as 'known only to modern times' and 'the most extraordinary and unaccountable phenomenon that has yet appeared in human affairs'.

² Letters of Queen Victoria, 1st Series, vol. II, p. 464.

³ Letters of Queen Victoria, 2nd Series, vol. III, p. 547.

(b) Lack of party discipline.

Until some few years after 1832 there was always a considerable interspersing of loosely attached members whose votes could not be counted on by either party; and there was a still larger number of members whose loyalty could not be relied upon in unexpected emergencies. The absence of party solidarity naturally hindered Ministers from maintaining a steady course of policy. Walpole found, on more than one occasion, that the approach of a general election shook the dependability of his majority owing to members' fears of offending their electors by supporting measures which were likely to prove unpopular.¹ This kind of embarrassment was not confined to the last stages of a Parliament. It has been remarked earlier in this chapter that the turning of the balance of votes against Walpole, prior to his retirement at the beginning of 1742, was due to desertions rather than defeats in the constituencies. Many of his supporters bided their time and abstained from voting until it became clear whether or not the tactics of the Opposition were going to prove successful. Horace Walpole wrote to Horace Mann on 16 December 1741: 'It was a day of much expectation, and both sides had raked together all probabilities: I except near twenty, who are in town, but stay to vote on a second question, when the majority may be decided to either party.' And again on 24 December 1741 he wrote: 'We had forty-one more members in town, who would not, or could not come down.'²

National affairs were never, perhaps, more agitated and critical, and consequently the people never more alarmed and sensitive, than in 1756, when the elder Pitt first obtained control of the national fortunes, and in 1780, at the time of the disasters in America towards the end of Lord North's Ministry. Both these periods were typical of the stages in the eighteenth century when majorities were specially capricious. In the years leading up to 1780, Lord North possessed a majority which seemed to be proof against annihilation. But during the months which preceded the general election of that year his majority on more than one occasion fell away. The agitation for measures of reform and for dealing with the scandal of corruption led members, who were shortly to become candidates, to vote against the Government.¹ In 1782, when Shelburne had become Prime Minister, a report was made to him by John Robinson, the Treasury expert in party management, regarding the composition of parties at that time.

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 82; Lord Hervey, Memoirs of the Court of George II (ed. Sedgwick), vol. i, pp. 167-8.

² Letters of Horace Walpole (ed. Toynbee), vol. i, pp. 141, 147.

'Nothing can be more difficult', the report said, 'than to form a state of the political sentiments of the House of Commons in the present juncture. In a stable, permanent government to whom gentlemen have professed friendship, with whom they have in general acted, and from whom they have received favors, conjectures may be formed with tolerable certainty of the opinions which gentlemen will entertain on particular questions, but, in a state so rent as this has lately been, torn by intestine divisions, and split into different parties, . . . it is the hardest task that can be to class them.'²

Another observer, who ventured upon an estimate in the following year, 1783, calculated that the Government could count on 140 votes, Lord North upon 120, and Fox upon 90, the balance of votes being uncertain.³ Even after the striking success of the younger Pitt in the elections of 1784 he sustained occasional defeats. The Westminster Scrutiny, Parliamentary Reform, and the Fortification Scheme are examples. He did not regard the Parliament elected in 1784 as providing him with a reliable majority. 'It was', he said, 'composed of men who think, or at least act, so much for themselves that we are hardly sure from day to day what impression they may receive.'⁴ Papers which have been found among those of one of the private secretaries of the younger Pitt give an estimate of the number of members who were 'independent or unconnected' as 108 in 1788, that is to say, four years after he had assumed office. As late as 1806 Canning wrote:

'I am particularly glad to receive such accounts as have been sent to me by some of our friends skilled in such mystical matters, of the numerical effect of the new elections. From one quarter I hear the gain of new strength to the Government is no more than 29—and that to Opposition 22—that 5 more are to be considered hopeful for us and 14 as doubtful. . . .'⁵

¹ Fitzmaurice, Life of Shelburne, 1st ed., vol. iii, pp. 74, 81.

² Parliamentary Papers of John Robinson, 1774-84 (Camden Society), p. 42.

³ Gibbon, Miscellaneous Works, 1814 ed., vol. ii, p. 262.

⁴ Rosebery, Life of Pitt, pp. 76, 78.

⁵ Hist. MSS. Comm., 13th Report, Appendix, Part VII (Lonsdale MSS.), p. 223.

The constitutional changes consequent on the passing of the great Reform Bill did not, as might be assumed, immediately bring in their train a stiffening of party discipline. On the contrary, the large majority in favour of reform proved unwieldy and vacillating. The democratization of the constituencies weakened or removed such rudiments of discipline as had existed under the old corrupt pocket-borough system; and, for a time, no party organization was adequate to take their place. Members were even more apt than before to act independently of the leaders of the party to which they generally adhered. Peel wrote to Croker in 1833, 'there is no steadiness in the House, . . . the force of party connexions, by which alone a government can pursue a consistent course, is quite paralysed.'¹ After some thirty or forty years, however, the party leaders began to see that entirely new methods were requisite if the favour of the increasing electorate was to be secured. As a result of the development of the organization of parties, a rigid party discipline was imposed on members; and it has generally been possible in the course of the last half-century to estimate fairly closely the majority on which a Ministry could rely for all normal purposes at any particular time. There were in the nineteenth century, and there are still, a few members whose independence of outlook prevents their accepting any disciplinary control. John Bright was an example. He once explained to his constituents that he could never forget his own character and long-held principles and what he believed to be the true interests of the country 'to abandon all these, and vote as the necessities of party may require, at the crack of the party whip'.² But, nowadays, financial reasons, among others, prevent more than a small proportion of members maintaining a consistent attitude of independence of party discipline. If a member's election expenses are paid out of party funds, as is the increasing practice, it is almost impossible for him to do otherwise than vote as his party directs.

(c) Ignorance of constituents regarding composition of parties.

Many candidates in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century elections stood on the ground of their personal and local reputations as honest, intelligent, and influential citizens.

¹ J. R. Thursfield, Peel, pp. 125-6.

² G. M. Trevelyan, Life of John Bright, p. 192.

Their constituencies knew little of their political opinions, if any, or of the records of their past action in Parliament; and the voters were, therefore, disabled from casting their votes with the object of turning the scale in favour of one or other of the parties vying for supremacy.

Party organizers saw that advantage might be gained by disseminating information regarding the political records of parliamentary candidates, especially those of candidates of the other side in the campaign. Election addresses to constituencies with a narrow franchise were almost unknown; and such addresses as were published scarcely ever contained any undertakings in regard to policy. Their general use, in anything but a formal shape, is a comparatively modern refinement; and often, no doubt, a candidate who had voted for a measure which proved unpopular trusted that his constituents knew nothing of the matter. Lists of members of preceding Parliaments, marked so as to show how they had voted on important questions, were freely used as electioneering literature. They played an important part in constitutional development. For not only did they provide party managers with a means of denouncing their opponents, but they drew attention to issues in their alternative aspect and thus prepared the way for the later progress towards the submission of political questions for decision by the people.

Even as early as the Commonwealth period there were instances of the publication of division lists at times other than election time. One of the first lists of members divided into two classes, published with the object of influencing voting in a general election, was one circulated prior to the election of 1660. It was entitled The Grand Memorandum, or a true and perfect catalogue of the Secluded Members of the House of Commons, sitting 16th March, 1659 [1660], being the day of their Dissolution. Also a perfect Catalogue of the Rumpers, some of them sitting with the Secluded Members the same day; Together with the Names of such as were the King's Judges, and condemned Him to death under their Hands and Seals, marked with an ¶. This broadsheet was expressed to be published

'to prevent mistakes, and that the people of this Nation may see and know who have been their Oppressors, and the fatal Betrayers of their Liberties, by erecting High Courts of Justice, and acting many other enormities, &c. And that they may be the better guided in their FUTURE ELECTIONS.'¹

¹ Brit. Mus., 660, f. 24 (37).

In 1681 a writer of a tract in the Whig interest advised the electors to reject 124 listed members of the late Parliament who had displayed Roman Catholic proclivities.

'It concerns thee to know,' he wrote, 'if ever thou votest again as of late for a free Parliament, that the persons named in this list are for the most part that seed by which the degenerate and now tottering Ministers of Rome and France hope to propagate by money and gifts a fresh execrable generation of Roman and French Ministers and pensioners.'¹

Again, in 1690, the Whigs circulated a paper containing a list of 150 Tories who had voted against the abdication of James II; and the Tories replied by circulating a list of those who had voted for the Corporation Bill, as 'Republicans, Fanatics, Latitudinarians, or Atheists'.

There is no reason to think that the distribution of these lists in the early stages of the development of the party system did much more than affect individual election fights in constituencies. Moral and social attributes were in many, if not most, quarters considered to be just as important as political ones.² But, in the first years of the eighteenth century, the distribution of division lists seems to have played a considerable part in election campaigns. At the beginning of the reign of Queen Anne the Whigs issued a 'black list' of 167 Tory members of the late Parliament, whom they denounced as the friends of France. The Tories retorted with a list of those who had voted for a standing army; and both sides published defences of their previous conduct. A Tory tract advised electors to pay due attention to records of voting in the preceding House of Commons.

'If a candidate for Parliament', it said, 'has ever sat in that House before, the electors ought to be satisfied how he attended and how he voted, especially in all critical and important questions; wherein men more particularly distinguish themselves, either for affection, wisdom, or courage, or all of 'em.' . . . If the candidate has never been a member before, the next certain indication is his conduct in his own country on all public occasions. The electors should examine what sort of men he constantly favoured: what party he has always joyn'd.'³

¹ Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1680-1, p. 675.

² See Some Cautions offered to the Consideration of those who are to chuse Members, &c. (1695) [by George Savile, Marquis of Halifax], where, among a large number of moral qualifications and disqualifications, voting against the Triennial Bill was the only criterion of a public character.

³ Some necessary Considerations relating to all future elections, &c. (1702).

Similar party propaganda was used in the 1705 election in connexion with the Bill to prevent occasional conformity, and, in the 1710 election, respecting the impeachment of Sacheverell.¹

In spite of the hindrances to the working of the party system in the reigns of George I and George II, owing to the prevalence of faction, there were issues of a sufficiently provocative nature to cause a continuance of the practice of distributing division lists with the intention of influencing voters at elections. In 1722 the passing of the Septennial Act remained a scandal in the view of many opponents of the Ministry. Lists of those who had voted for and against this measure were published in the press and in political tracts.² The Excise Scheme, too, was still a bogey in the election of 1734 and prompted the issue of division lists with the object, so it was alleged, and doubtless with truth, of securing the removal of Walpole from power. A writer of a tract in the Walpole interest professed to be shocked that the object of the publication of these lists was the exclusion of the supporters of the Government and the turning out of the Ministry. It seemed to him to be most irregular for the opponents of the Excise Scheme to attempt 'to render the Administration odious, and thereby to raise discontents and dissatisfactions in the people against the Government, which practice can tend to nothing but confusion and ruin'.³ It need not be supposed that the electors regarded themselves as in a position to decide whether Walpole should remain in office; still, it is interesting to see that it should have occurred, even to a few persons, that the distribution of division lists was an incitement, not merely to reject particular candidates, but to determine whether the composition of the Ministry should be changed.

As information on the course of business in Parliament became more generally available to the public and division lists began to be published in the press, political tracts of the class which has been mentioned became less frequent. Nevertheless, these tracts continued down to the time of the younger

¹ Somer's Tracts, 2nd ed. by W. Scott, vol. xii, p. 474; An Exact List of the members . . . who, in some or other of the Questions upon the Impeachment of Dr. Henry Sacheverell, &c. (1710). See also Chandler's Debates, vol. v, Appendix, pp. 110-35.

² Weekly Journal, 17 and 24 Mar. 1722; A Guide to the Electors of Great Britain, being lists of all those members, &c. (1722); An Exact List of the Knights, &c. (1722).

³ Some Observations upon a Paper intitled The List, &c. (1733); The Bee or Universal Weekly Pamphlet, vol. ii (July 1733), pp. 822 ff.

Pitt.¹ Towards the end of the eighteenth century reports of parliamentary proceedings were easily available in several periodicals. It was not, however, until 1836 that division lists were officially published as part of the record of the proceedings of the House of Commons. But, by that time, nearly every candidate found it necessary to declare to his electors the party to which he belonged, and the publication of lists was no longer necessary as an aid to enlightening the electors on the political allegiance of candidates.²

(d) General elections and the computation of party strength.

Until comparatively modern times the uncertain character of party allegiances prevented the possibility of any positive result emerging from general elections, beyond the mere election of members. There were many cries and much turmoil; but no one could say at the end of the election: 'Such and such a party will now take or continue in office and carry out such and such a policy.'

Recognized tests were, however, applied after the conclusion of general elections, in order to obtain indications of the comparative strength of parties. The voting on the election of the Speaker and on the question of contested election returns—both treated in a partisan spirit—were taken as giving a fair idea of the disposition of party forces. Godolphin wrote to Robert Harley in December 1701: 'The choice of a Speaker will be a very decisive stroke in the ensuing Parliament.'³ In October 1705 the choice of Smith, a Whig and anti-tacker, was interpreted as denoting that the Whigs had won the victory at the polls. In the following March Godolphin wrote a letter to Robert Harley which shows that, after several months, the balance of parties was far from plain.

'I think as you do', he said, 'that the Tories are more numerous in this Parliament than the Whigs, and the Queen's servants much the least part of the three. My computation runs thus:

¹ One of Burke's cures for the Present Discontents was the use of 'frequent and correct lists of the voters in all important questions'.

² As late as 1822 a tract was published entitled The Elector's Remembrancer; or Guide to the Votes of each member of the House of Commons for the first two sessions of the Present Parliament. It gave particulars of the votes of every member on the main questions of the day. But the composition of parties was in a confused stage in 1822.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part IV (Portland MSS.), vol. iv, pp. 28, 291.

of the 450 that chose the Speaker, Tories 190, Whigs 160, Queen's Servants 100; of the last about 15 perhaps joined with Tories in that vote of the Speaker, by which they mounted to 205, and so afterwards more or less, in almost every vote.¹

The two last general elections in which Walpole figured, namely, those of 1734 and 1741, both of considerable interest, left the composition of the parties indefinite at their conclusion. A writer, reviewing the course of the former election in a periodical of 1734, disapproved of a list which had appeared, 'wherein the members are distinguished according to their supposed parties'. He alleged that such lists could not be reliable, since there was not sufficient evidence on which to base them. He criticized published estimates in which the neutral men were all given to the Court 'as if impartial, independent Whiggs must of course vote with the Administration'; the 205 who voted against the Excise were marked as 'standing votes' against the measures of the Ministry, though perhaps it was the only measure they ever opposed.² The Gentleman's Magazine for 1734 gave lists of members returned, distinguishing them, not by parties, but by reference to their support or opposition to the Excise Bill, to the Septennial Bill, or to both.³ Sir Thomas Robinson, writing to Lord Carlisle at the end of 1734, said that he had made the best inquiry he could regarding the strength of the contending parties in the newly elected House of Commons, that it was difficult to obtain reliable information, and that the Court claimed a majority of 100, while the Opposition hoped that the majority would be no more than 50.⁴

So also in 1741. The Craftsman regarded as a novelty the publication of a list of the newly chosen Parliament 'wherein those supposed to be in the Court interest are distinguished by being printed in italick characters, from those supposed to be in the Country interest, as it is called, who are printed in Roman characters'. The Craftsman also published a dialogue with a 'Mr. Grub' in order to illustrate the editorial opinions on the matter.

'Yes, Sir, I have already had a cursory view of several lists; but it is impossible to make any exact calculation of the number, either on one side or the other, till the Parliament is assembled

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part IV (Portland MSS.), vol. iv, pp. 28, 291.

² The Free Briton, 4 July 1734.

³ See the numbers for April and May.

⁴ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 142.

in form. There are many new members chosen, of whom we have not yet had any experience; and how can anybody answer for their sentiments or conduct before they are try'd? Besides, Mr. Grub, can you pretend to be ignorant that several gentlemen of both parties have altered their opinions since the last general election; and how can we judge of their future behaviour? Have not some, who were formerly favourites, been turned out of place? Have not others, who were at the same time treated as malcontents and incendiaries, been since restored to favour, though not to their former places?"¹

The Gentleman's Magazine for 1741 published a list of members returned in the election of that year marked in a complicated but significant manner.² Some members were described, for instance, as 'said to be in the Country interest', others 'inclined to the Court', others 'thought to be neutral or doubtful', and others, with less uncertainty, 'places under the Crown'.

This indefiniteness persisted throughout the eighteenth century. At the end of the general election of 1761 Newcastle, who had a larger opportunity than most to estimate the result, admitted that he did not know the political leanings of as many as two-thirds of the new members.³ A few lists purporting to distinguish Court and Country appeared in the press; but they were conjectural. Estimates were produced for special purposes, divided into so many 'pro', so many 'con', and so many 'doubtful'. There was no definite information on which reliance could be placed. Candidates did not often label themselves as being attached to one party or another; and, even if they admitted a preference, they did not pretend that the preference would necessarily be permanent.

After the Reform Bill election of 1831 fairly dependable lists appeared, dividing returned members into those for and against the Bill; but the division was not, in terms, based on party distinctions. In 1835 even The Times did not venture to publish lists of returned members divided according to parties, though it quoted from other periodicals estimates of Radical and Conservative gains. A book of reference, like Dod's Parliamentary Companion, did not mark members according to their parties in lists of the new Parliament.

¹ Craftsman, No. 781, 20 June 1741; No. 786, 25 June 1741.

² p. 311.

³ Mr. L. B. Namier has dealt exhaustively with this subject in his work on England in the Age of the American Revolution, vol. i, pp. 197-234.

But, in biographical notes respecting members, there were descriptions of 'Conservatives', 'of Whig principles', 'Reformers', 'Radicals', or inclined in one of these directions. From 1837 onwards the press gave the numerical result of the choice of the people between the parties and provided lists of returned members plainly showing their allegiances.

The disintegration of parties, following upon the repeal of the Corn Laws, made a division of members into categories a matter of temporary difficulty. At the time of the election of 1857, for instance, The Times, in view of the personal nature of the issues, at first gave lists which distinguished members into 'Ministerialist' and 'Opposition', according to the declared opinions upon the attitude of Palmerston regarding Chinese hostilities. After some days, when it became clear that there was a decided majority for Palmerston, members were 'arranged according to their general political opinions'; and they were classed either as Liberals or Conservatives, though some of them could not have fallen very easily into either of these descriptions. The habit of candidates offering themselves as adherents of one side or another in politics has in recent years become so firmly rooted that it may be assumed that any increase in the number of parties will not involve a reversion to the old obscurities.

Attention has been paid in the preceding paragraphs to circumstances which impeded the development of the party system in the direction of its full usefulness and to the manner in which these circumstances changed. The imperfect information available to the people at large in the eighteenth century, first, regarding the political views of parliamentary candidates, secondly, regarding the way in which members had cast their votes in Parliament on important questions, and, thirdly, regarding the balance of party strength at the conclusion of general elections, naturally acted as a serious handicap both to the people's ability to appreciate the political issues of the day and to their votes being interpreted as a declaration in favour of any line of policy. When, as is now the practice, every candidate stands as an acknowledged supporter of one of two or three parties and is pledged to forward its programme, the results of general elections are generally capable of being interpreted as decisions by the people in favour of one Ministry rather than another, or one programme rather than another.

§ 3. Coalitions

Several different types of temporary alliances between parties, groups, or even individuals have been described as coalitions. In some of the circumstances of these alliances, the working of the party system and the role of the Opposition in Parliament have not been seriously interfered with. In others, the result of the alliances has been to suspend, or at least to dislocate, the operation of the party system and to restrict the exercise of the functions of the Opposition. It is obvious that the latter class is apt to endanger the immediate, and possibly the ultimate, prospects of democratic government. When the machinery of government is put out of gear, even with the intention of its being reinstated after a period, it may not prove easy, when the time comes, for the pre-existing conditions to be resumed.

There can be no objection either to a reassortment of parties or groups, if based on principle and not merely on self-interest, or to the formation of a new party on a permanent basis, as a result of the emergence of an issue that cuts across prevailing party principles. The Ministries formed in 1806 and 1827 exemplify regrouping of parties, into which it may be said that questions of principle to some extent entered. And Lord Grey's Ministry of 1830, in which Whigs and Canningites joined forces, described by Professor Trevelyan as 'first and foremost a coalition to carry reform',¹ had among other justifications the establishment of the Liberal party.

Up to the time of the younger Pitt, the party system was still so undeveloped that the coalescence of groups, whose political views were not too disparate, was not as a rule regarded as being open to question. When, however, force of circumstances drove the elder Pitt into combination with Newcastle in 1757, there were many who regarded as indecorous Pitt's association with one whom he had only just ceased to abuse and deride. And there is no doubt that the people in general would have preferred to have seen him acting independently of the Court faction.

The 'unholy alliance' of Fox and North in 1783 seemed so obviously to be founded on 'interest', rather than on principle, that the general disgust which it produced rendered any proposal of coalition for years afterwards open to suspicion.

¹ G. M. Trevelyan, Lord Grey of the Reform Bill, p. 250.

The Ministry of the younger Pitt, which was formed at the end of 1783, although frequently classified as 'Tory', was not without an infusion of Whig blood. Yet it could hardly be described as a coalition. Few Ministries have been strictly homogeneous. But it is difficult to understand how it was that the younger Pitt contemplated a coalition with Fox in 1784. This would have involved a junction of two extremes. There may have been more excuse for the proposal of a similar coalition in 1792;¹ and there was, perhaps, still more reason for his endeavour to deal with the national emergency of 1804 by again proposing that Fox should join him in the formation of a Ministry.

How far the divisions caused by the issue of free trade rendered inevitable the formation of the Whig and Peelite coalition in 1852 may be open to doubt. Although the permanent affiliations to which the coalition led may give it some justification, it is certain that the members of the Ministry had few political principles in common. The views of some of them were divergent, especially those of Aberdeen and Palmerston. Derby and Disraeli agreed that the basis of the coalition was largely hatred of the latter. It was at this time that Disraeli, who was fond of saying that there could be no parliamentary government if there were no party government, told the House of Commons that 'England does not love coalitions'.² But only a politician with exceptionally rigid principles could resist the inducements of coalition in an unstable and deranged condition of parties such as that prevailing in 1852. Indeed, in so far as coalitions tend towards the permanent absorption of groups into parties, they have something to recommend them. Curiously enough, it is now known that, a few hours before denouncing the formation of the Aberdeen coalition, Disraeli had himself been contemplating the possibility of a Radical-Tory coalition, in which Cobden and Bright might share places with his own friends.³

In more recent years, coalitions have been promoted on the occasion of large crises, such as war or economic upheaval, in which the safety or stability of the State has been involved, with the object not only of securing the largest possible measure of unanimity in the House of Commons and of mustering the best intellect and energy available regardless of party distinctions, but also of displaying in the international sphere a Ministry with a formidable personnel and united front. It has been asserted that all parties should be represented in Ministries of this special kind and that the normal attitude of the Opposition should be in abeyance. It is to be remarked that coalitions so formed have not been rendered inevitable owing to the reassortment of groups. The intention has been to deal with a particular situation by a temporary modification of the methods of government.

¹ Holland, Memoirs of the Whig Party, vol. i, p. 30; Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 696, Charles James Fox to Lord Carlisle, 25 July 1792.

² 123 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1665-6.

³ Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli (new edition), vol. i, p. 1225.

After the war of 1914-18 had been in progress some nine months, signs of weakness and disunity in administration led to a demand, in the press particularly, for a national Government. It was contended that all opposition between parties should cease and that a Ministry made up of politicians of all parties should be formed so that the efforts of the nation should be concentrated on the winning of the war. A Ministry was accordingly formed in May 1915, which comprised twelve Liberals, eight Conservatives, and one member of the Labour party. The leaders of both the Liberal and the Conservative parties asserted that the coalition was formed for the sole purpose of pursuing the war and would not involve any compromise of principles. Mr. G. E. Buckle, the joint biographer of Disraeli, wrote to The Times pointing out that Disraeli never denounced a national Government such as that under formation; and he drew a distinction between an honourable association of statesmen, undertaken so as to pursue a policy on which they are united, and a sacrifice of convictions for the sake of place and revenge. But there are many who now feel that the advantages that were derived from the formation of this coalition Ministry, which continued, after reconstruction, until 1922, were largely outweighed by its disadvantages. The loss involved, by the absence of opposition between parties, had to be set off against the gain secured by the concentration of intellectual ability and by apparent unanimity.

There is much to be said for the view that the rationale of the party system is equally applicable in times of crises as it is in ordinary times. The suspension of the party system gives an impression that it amounts to a species of competition in politics in which the country can afford to indulge when no serious mischief is likely to result, but which must be dropped when arduous and critical business is in hand.

No doubt standing party differences sink into insignificance in the presence of a war which engages the whole strength of a nation; and anything which has the least savour of faction is specially reprehensible, and must be more rigorously excluded than in times of peace. Possibly all parties may be in general agreement regarding the necessity of war and even regarding its general conduct; but there still remains the need for the watchfulness and the criticism, which a sensible and high-principled Opposition alone can supply. Moreover, there are always to be apprehended, in connexion with coalitions, the lobbying and accommodations behind the scenes, which the association of members of different parties is almost bound to involve.

The circumstances of the formation of the joint, coalition, or national Ministry of 1931 are too recent to enable any conclusions to be drawn regarding its justification or usefulness. It may, however, be remarked that, although the Government was at first described by the Prime Minister as a national Government, he qualified this description by insisting that it was not a coalition Government in the usual sense, but was a Government 'of co-operation', 'of individuals'. It was impossible to describe it as a national Ministry, in the sense of one which represents the whole House of Commons and against which no Opposition is ranged. The Prime Minister further stated that the Ministry was not a coalition of parties, since party principles were to be retained in their integrity. It is difficult, nevertheless, to see how there can be a coalition of individuals in a Ministry without involving a coalition of their followers in Parliament, and consequently in some degree a coalition of parties or groups.

The Ministry of 1931, like that of 1915, was stated by the Prime Minister to be formed to deal with a particular emergency, and it was said to be limited as regards its period by the needs of that emergency. 'When that purpose is achieved', said Mr. MacDonald, 'the political parties will resume their respective positions.'

Considerable difference of opinion prevailed regarding the proper time for the cessation of the coalition Ministry formed in connexion with the Great War and for the resumption of normal party government. It must always be difficult to say when an emergency is over. But it is safe to assert that it is better, both for the democratic control of parliamentary government and for the political future of the co-operating Ministers, for too early a date to be chosen than one which is commonly regarded as too late.

But there may be other disadvantages than delay in the resignation of a joint or coalition Ministry after the circumstances that gave rise to its creation have ceased to apply. In spite of the expressed intention that pre-existing party positions shall be restored, this intention may prove impossible to carry out. It is conceivable, of course, that a coalition may produce a definite division of members into two parties, when more than two parties previously existed. If this should happen, the coalition would be largely justified. A more probable outcome is the disintegration of pre-existing parties into groups, an end which no well-wisher of democracy, who is familiar with the effect of such division into groups upon the course of parliamentary politics in other countries, can view with equanimity.

Presumably the established convention, that, after the resignation of a Ministry, an appeal should be made to the people by the newly appointed successors, ought to apply to the occasion of the formation of a coalition Ministry. Its application was not practicable in 1915; but a general election was held soon after the formation of the joint Ministry of 1931. There is not sufficient experience to show whether, in practice, submissions to the people, by joint or coalition Ministries, formed for emergency purposes, are likely to be less definite than submissions during the normal working of the party system; but it would seem that they are. Where a coalition is one of individuals as much as of parties, the tendency must surely be for personal issues to eclipse issues of policy.

CHAPTER VI

PARTY ORGANIZATION AND POLICY

§ 1. The organization of members

BEFORE parties possessed central organizations, the chief method of keeping a party together and of ensuring some degree of collaboration in Parliament was by meetings of members outside the House of Commons, for the purpose of discussion and the stimulation of united action. 'Private meetings' of members were held as early as 1640.¹ In the course of the eighteenth century there grew up a practice of Ministers summoning their adherents to meet together prior to the opening of sessions of Parliament.

It is clear that, in the early history of parties, considerable suspicion rested on any organization, by virtue of which members met outside the House and pledged themselves to vote together in a consistent manner. A Whig tract of 1701 entitled A List of One Unanimous Club of Members of the late Parliament, November 11th, 1701, that met in the Vine Tavern in Long Acre, who ought to be opposed in the ensuing elections illustrates such an attitude. This tract asserted the impropriety of the co-operation by the members, whose names were given, in voting against the abdication of James II and against recognizing William III.² Tory tracts appeared in answer to the Whig imputations and justified the party meetings. 'It has been customary, as well as thought necessary, in all reigns, for members of Parliament to associate at what places they thought convenient, and never till now thought a crime'; and 'as to a club of such members, mentioned in the scandalous pamphlet . . . there was no such club, except in the Parliament House, where they met for the nation's interest and preservation and to stand by His Majesty against the exorbitant greatness of France'.³

As early as 1690 the Tory members dined together, to the number of one hundred and fifty, for the purpose of concerting measures before undertaking the general election campaign; and probably similar meetings were held by the Whigs during the elections of 1679-81, since they were more advanced than their opponents in the arts of party management.

¹ Journals of D'Ewes, ed. Notestein, p. 22 (note).

² Protests against this kind of co-operation may have been made some few years earlier. Cf. A List of one Unanimous Club of Voters in the Long Parliament Dissolved in 1679, &c. (published in 1715).

³ An Answer to an infamous libel entitled a List, &c. (1701). An Answer to the Black List or the Vine-Tavern Queries (1701).

Some few years before Walpole was First Minister there were regular party meetings of the members of Parliament who supported the Ministry. These meetings were summoned at the beginning of sessions. Their formal object was to hear a statement of the policy of the Ministry; but it is evident that some discussion ensued; and it may be assumed that the meetings were intended to encourage party loyalty. An entry in the diary of the First Earl of Egmont for 14 January 1734 is informative respecting this kind of party organization. He wrote:

'This day I had two letters, one to be at Sir Robert Walpole's to-morrow at seven at night, the other to be at the Cockpit on Wednesday at the same hour; but I intend to be at neither. The business is to be made acquainted with the King's Speech for Thursday next; the meeting for to-morrow is of a select number, at the other meeting all who please may come.'¹

The Opposition also held meetings of members in Walpole's time. Old Horatio Walpole wrote in 1740:

'The opponents, flushed with their not being beat by a greater majority than 16, have met, Lords and Commons, to the number of 13 of the first and about 60 of the last at a tavern, and exhorted one another to steadiness and unanimity, and continuance in town to lay hold of occasion for the service of the public. . . .'²

There is reported a numerous meeting of the members of Parliament 'in the British interest' at the Fountain Tavern in the Strand in March 1743, 'who solemnly engaged to give and promote an early and constant attendance in the next session, to support the Constitution and true interest of His Majesty's British dominions.'³ In 1751 the principal members of the Opposition met at Egmont's house with the object of forming plans for the future; and in 1755 sixty-two Tories met at the 'Horn', 'where they agreed to secrecy, though they observed it not; and determined to vote according to their several engagements on previous questions'.¹ In 1762 the Duke of Grafton and other young men tried to co-ordinate the efforts of the Opposition by means of meetings of supporters. George Onslow was one of these and, on his information, Newcastle wrote to Hardwicke: 'Our friends in the House of Commons are desirous of collecting themselves together, that they may know one another; for that purpose they wish to have a meeting; they are sure they shall be 180 at least. This deserves consideration. . .'.² In 1769 Burke recorded an Opposition meeting. 'All the minority,' he said, '(however composed) dines together at the Thatched House'.³ Several of the clubs of the late eighteenth century, both those which were exclusively political, like the Whig Club, and those which were mainly social, like Brooks's, must have helped from time to time to hold together the members of the Opposition.

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., vol. ii, p. 7; cf. a meeting mentioned in Lord Hervey's Memoirs (ed. Sedgwick), vol. i, pp. 179 ff. See also Hist. MSS. Comm., 8th Report, Appendix, p. 223, 7 Dec. 1756, H. Digby to Lord Digby; W. Coxe, Memoirs of Sir R. Walpole, vol. ii, p. 201; W. Michael, Englische Geschichte im Achtzehnten Jahrhundert, vol. ii, p. 585; and an article in 44 E.H.R., pp. 588 ff., by L. B. Namier, entitled, 'The Circular Letters'.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 14th Report, Appendix, Part IX, Buckingham, &c., MSS., p. 39; Letters of Horace Walpole (ed. Toynbee), vol. i, p. 173.

³ 13 Gentleman's Magazine (1743), p. 161.

Occasional references such as those given above provide the chief evidence there is of party meetings in the eighteenth century whose object was the inducement of unity of action. But the independent manner in which many members voted indicates that the meetings that were held were either attended by an inconsiderable number or were insufficiently unanimous to secure any steady adherence to party.

In the first half of the nineteenth century there was, it seems, more frequent use of these gatherings, especially in the few years following the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, a time at which efforts to obtain unity were particularly required. The foundation of the great social-political clubs of the Victorian period, the Carlton Club in 1832 and the Reform Club in 1836, served to promote unanimity. But the elaboration of party organization, which began in the middle of the nineteenth century, soon made the earlier methods appear primitive. Though meetings of members of Parliament are still held for particular purposes, they are no longer used to maintain allegiance; and, with rare exceptions, the questions of policy with which they deal are special rather than general.

¹ Horace Walpole, Memoirs of the reign of George II (ed. Holland), vol. i, pp. 80-1, vol. ii, p. 13. ² C. P. Yorke, Life of Hardwicke, vol. iii, p. 438.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part X (Charlemont MSS.), vol. i, pp. 293-4. See also Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 536, Anthony Storer to Lord Carlisle, 26 Nov. 1781.

As regards the organization of discipline within the walls of Parliament, the Patronage Secretary (now the Parliamentary Secretary of the Treasury), who was first appointed early in the eighteenth century, probably exercised, soon after the institution of his office, many of the functions of a Government Whip and, it may be assumed, had an occasional counterpart on the Opposition side.¹ Prior to 1832, no doubt, these officials must have been concerned to influence elections as much as the voting in the House of Commons. But as the necessity for stringent party discipline in the House became more and more apparent during the nineteenth century, the numbers of Whips were increased and their importance became enhanced. In recent years, although the Whips find it requisite, in the normal state of parties, rather to collect their troops than to prevent their going over to the enemy, the marshalling of the forces to be led into the lobbies continues to hold an important place in the working of the party system.

§ 2. Central and local electioneering organization

From the time of Shaftesbury's pioneer work as an election organizer in 1679 down to the middle of the nineteenth century, some rudimentary central party organizations intermittently influenced the character of the issues raised in the constituencies; and, for the best part of the last hundred years, the influence of central party organizations on the submission of issues has been both frequent and pronounced. To a less extent the constituencies themselves have been able, on some few occasions, to take a part in the selection of questions for decision at general elections.

The model instructions to newly elected members, which seem to have been circulated by Shaftesbury's Green Ribbon Club in 1681, provide the earliest instance of any widespread attempt by a party head-quarters to dictate a party programme.² Wharton, in the time of Queen Anne, was the next politician to show a lively appreciation of the value of organizing a general election campaign. He possessed influence in several counties and was tireless in scouring the country in order to secure the return of Whig members. Walpole and the Pelhams, in the elections of 1722, 1734, 1741, and 1747, extended the method and the period of electioneering by arranging speech-making campaigns in the constituencies prior to the dissolution of Parliament. The Opposition soon followed suit. Pelham evidently viewed the new methods with repugnance. He wrote to Lord Essex that he had been involved in much trouble and expense and 'most disagreeable conversation throughout the whole country'. He had talked until he was hoarse, but hoped the results would be satisfactory.¹ An Opposition tract of 1741 sneered at Walpole's attempts to control the course of the general election in the country.

¹ Cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 547, Storer to Lord Carlisle, 11 Dec. 1781.

² See Appendix II and pp. 15, 74 above.

'You must know', it said, 'that when the septennial wars [i.e. the elections at the end of the seven-years' Parliament] draw near, the Commander-in-Chief sits down at his desk, draws the plan of operation for the campaign, and appoints his officers, without any distinction whether they are veterans or raw inexperienced boys, provided they are well recommended, and promise to obey command. He then sends them to their particular posts, with proper ammunition, whilst he generally continues at his head-quarters; and his aides des camps are continually passing backwards and forwards, to bring him an account of the success of every battle.'²

In 1747 the Duke of Newcastle organized a tour of the counties of Kent and Surrey, so as to influence the constituencies in those parts; but efforts of this character were more directed towards ensuring that family influence was fully exploited than towards comprehensive election management.

During the second half of the eighteenth century some of the Whig magnates employed men of organizing ability to forward the interests of the groups which they led. Rockingham expected his secretary, Burke, to do more than act as his personal assistant. Burke, indeed, has been described as having 'suggested policies, drafted petitions, arranged for meetings, looked after elections, arranged everything and goaded everybody'.³ In general, however, party organization on a large scale must necessarily have diminished during the reign of George III, at least so far as the Whigs were concerned; and it is probable that it was not until the period immediately following the death of the younger Pitt that there were signs of the resumption of any effective central organization in the Whig party. Lord Holland records that, in the election of

¹ MS. Letter of 15 Oct. 1733, quoted in Torrens, History of Cabinets, vol. i, p. 433.

² A Review of a late Motion, &c. (1741).

³ Ernest Barker, Burke and Bristol, p. 50.

1807, the Whigs raised some few hundred pounds for the management of the press and the distribution of hand-bills.¹ The Whigs appear, moreover, to have had at this time a central fund, which was used to assist approved candidates in securing seats. The development was probably a fresh one.²

Each Reform measure of the nineteenth century, as it provided for further enlargement of the franchise, made it increasingly clear that success in election campaigns would depend on comprehensive arrangements, by which the local organizations in constituencies were linked up with a central party organization. Development on these lines had important effects on the relation of the electorate to the party system. The passing of the Reform Act of 1832 soon led to a quickening of interest in the possibilities of centralizing the conduct of election campaigns. Even prior to 1832, large sums were subscribed in London in the Whig interest and were dispensed by a responsible body, so as to assist needy candidates who supported Reform.³ And a short-lived organization known as 'The Parliamentary Candidate Society', having its office at the Whig head-quarters, the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, was instituted to co-ordinate information, with the object of recommending Whig candidates to constituencies. Large subscriptions were raised by Conservatives in preparation for the election of 1834, when a rudimentary central fund was initiated and a considerable organization of party activities was undertaken on Peel's behalf by Lord Granville Somerset.

By 1835 the Conservatives had formed local organizations; local registration societies had been instituted; and, after the Reform Bill of 1867 was passed, some local working-men's Conservative associations had come into being.

Until 1850 the party Whips did much of the work suitable to a central organization. Improvement on this crude arrangement was largely attributable to Disraeli. Soon after the defeat of the Conservatives in 1852 he employed Philip Rose, a solicitor, and later one of Rose's partners, to undertake a revision of party organization in the country; and, in 1867, largely owing to Disraeli's enthusiasm, the National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations was established. For some years, however, the activities of this federation were not extensive, its conferences only being attended by a small proportion of the representatives of local associations. Disraeli, perceiving that the defeats of the Conservatives in 1865 and 1868 were due to lack of efficient organization, proceeded to set up a Conservative Central Office under John Gorst, who also became honorary secretary of the National Union.

¹ Holland, Memoirs of the Whig Party, vol. ii, p. 227.

² Memoirs of Sir Samuel Romilly, vol. ii, p. 237.

³ Roebuck, History of the Whig Ministry of 1830, vol. ii, p. 161.

The Liberals instituted a Registration Association in 1861; and, in 1877, Joseph Chamberlain founded the National Liberal Federation, which revolutionized the relations between central and local associations. He called a meeting of delegates of local Liberal associations; and a plan was outlined, which gave the party machine new features and possibilities. He emphasized the right of the people to direct the initiative in the selection of members and the framing of issues. The new organization, the caucus as it came to be called, immediately proved that, as an electioneering expedient, it was extremely effective. From 1880 onwards, many Liberal local associations chose candidates on condition that they adopted the party programme; and any Liberal candidate who offered himself in opposition to a nominee of the association was treated as a traitor to the cause. The procedure which had previously been used was entirely different. Nearly all candidates had offered themselves for election without formal adoption by a local body, though a few had been recommended by the head-quarters of the party; and there had been no arrangement by which candidates had become pledged to a uniform party programme.

The periodical meetings of the Federation soon became concerned with the 'planks' of the party 'platform', and the influence of the Federation in this respect was very considerable in the years between 1883 and 1895. In 1883, 2,500 delegates from 500 associations passed resolutions in favour of the extension of household suffrage to the counties and the admission of women to the franchise. A meeting of the Federation in 1886 decided on a programme which included Home Rule, reform of the land laws, a popular system of county government, local option, and free schools; and, in the following year, the Federation passed a set of resolutions known as 'the Nottingham programme', which included Home Rule, one man one vote, free education, reform of the land laws, disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and labourers' allotments. The leaders of the party tried discreetly to protest against these resolutions being treated as a party programme.

Francis Schnadhorst, the capable organizer chosen by Chamberlain to develop his scheme, was the first secretary of the National Liberal Federation. In 1887 he also became honorary secretary of the Central Liberal Association. The virtual fusion of the Federation staff with the Central Office of the party, which thus took place, seriously limited the capacity of the Federation to control the policy of the party. The Central Office ensured that the Federation did not press any proposals of which the party leaders did not approve. In 1891, for instance, the Federation was anxious to have the question of an eight-hour day brought forward; but they were discouraged by the Central Office, since the leaders did not wish to show their hands on this subject.

It began to be obvious that, if the influence of the Federation was to be kept within the limits desired by the party leaders, it would be necessary that the arrangements for the meetings of the Federation should be carefully prepared by the officials of the Central Association. It was pointed out by Schnadhorst, at the time of the historic meeting at Newcastle in 1891, as well as on subsequent occasions, that delegates attended, not to express opinions, but to hear what measures the leaders of the party could adopt with a reasonable hope of maintaining a united party. As Schnadhorst remarked, it would be impossible for three thousand delegates to enter upon a discussion of fresh principles.

At this meeting at Newcastle (which culminated in a speech by Gladstone), the 'Newcastle programme' was adopted, comprising such diverse points as Home Rule, the disestablishment of the Welsh and Scottish churches, local veto on sale of intoxicants, one man one vote, parish councils, and employers' liability. This catalogue—a typical product of popular influence on the construction of a party programme—was a heavy burden round the neck of the Liberal party for some years to come. It was too extreme in one direction for some, and in another direction for others. The result was division of interest and consequent failure of unity and enthusiasm. The Ministry, which accepted the heads of the programme in general terms, made some show of introducing legislation to fulfil the pledge; but little progress was made; and it was found necessary to throw the blame of obstruction on the House of Lords in order to quiet criticism from the local associations. The history of the Newcastle programme has had the effect of discouraging a repetition of this feature in the decentralization of party management. After the further lessons which were learnt in the election of 1895, the Liberal Central Office was given larger authority; and the power of the local associations diminished in corresponding degree.

In recent years the Liberal party organization has been subjected to revision. The National Liberal Federation still acts as a useful co-ordinator of the activities of the local associations; but the shaping of party policy and the big schemes for propaganda are in the hands of the Central Office, or, more accurately speaking, in the hands of the Organization Committee.

It was soon discovered by the Conservatives that the intensive methods invented by Chamberlain were so effective that no party could afford to neglect them. The Conservative local associations were reorganized, and the Federation of Conservative Associations adopted many of the devices of the so-called caucus. In the Conservative party also, the development of the influence of these associations through their Federation was restrained by the close connexion between the Federation and the Central Office. The appointment of Gorst, as both honorary secretary of the National Union and as head of the Central Office, started a precedent which proved no less prejudicial to the activities of the Conservative Federation than the conjunction of the two offices in one person did for the Liberals. The delegates of the local Conservative associations were, in effect, prevented by the officials of the Central Office, which was under the control of the party leaders, from embarking on proposals likely to prove embarrassing. But it was not so necessary for the Central Office to prepare the ground for the Conservative Federation meetings as for those of the Liberals, since the resolutions passed were not regarded as having a close connexion with the construction of the official party programme.

The union in one person of the two principal administrative offices of the Conservative Federation and of the Central Office, which had worked without friction between 1886 and 1903, proved a source of dissension immediately after the latter date. After the serious reverses experienced by the Conservative party in 1906 and 1910, steps were taken to separate the two staffs, and yet to secure co-operation; but a large measure of control was retained by the Central Office. At the present time, the chief powers of the local associations, acting through the executive committees of provincial areas, are (1) to advise the Chairman of the Party Organization, (2) to keep the Executive Committee of the National Union in touch with the needs of the constituencies, and (3) to obtain and transmit to head-quarters local views on public questions, with the special object of assisting the work of the Executive Committee of the National Union. Though there have been of late signs of reaction against the impotence of the local associations and their Federation, it seems likely that any development towards decentralization will only be temporary.

The written constitution of the Labour party has the advantages, as well as the drawbacks, of being unhampered by the traditions of more slowly evolved organizations. Under its terms, the delegates at the annual party conference are entitled to decide from time to time 'what specific proposals of legislative, financial or administrative reform shall be included in the Party Programme'. Thereafter, the National Executive Committee (a body of twenty-four members, elected by the Party Conference) and the Executive Committee of the Parliamentary Labour Party decide which items of the Programme shall be included in the general election manifesto of the party. They also define the attitude of the party to issues raised by other parties. The Central Office is, unlike those of the Conservatives and the Liberals, subject to outside control, namely, that of the National Executive Committee.

Owing to the nature of its composition, the proceedings of the Labour Party Conference are restricted in a similar manner to the proceedings of other party conferences: Constructive business cannot be expected; and the best that can be done by the delegates is to discuss policy in general terms and to express aspirations. On one occasion Mr. Ramsay MacDonald objected to being tied down by the Party Conference to a specific programme. Of necessity the real administration and direction of the party rests in the main with the National Executive Committee and the Central Office. But the delegates in the Labour Party Conference, as in other parties, require reasonable respect to be paid to their views; and any manifestation of excessive centralization which fails to meet these susceptibilities is open to suspicion.

Express provision is made in the Labour Party Constitution that the National Executive Committee shall co-operate with the local associations in the selection of candidates; and candidates thus selected must be approved by the National Executive Committee and must adopt the principles of the party manifesto. Furthermore, Labour members, when elected, are required by the Constitution to subject themselves to party discipline. These provisions are more explicit than any adopted by the other parties; but the practice of the Conservatives and Liberals, in regard to the conduct of candidates who are nominated and financed by the Central Office, if less openly admitted, is not much less exacting than that of the Labour party.¹

As a result of the growth of party organizations, both central and local, during the last half-century, each party now possesses a machine of vast potentiality. In the first stages of this development, the creation of local associations was more notable than the increase in the power of the Central Offices. Latterly, the opposite has been the case. Yet at no stage has there been any real prospect that the extension of local party organization would give the constituencies a commensurate accession of power. The party machinery has provided efficient channels of communication between headquarters and the country; but the traffic in these channels has been chiefly from the centre to the circumference. They have been much more utilized for the exertion of the influence of the central organization and the party leaders than as a means for the communication of the ideas of the local associations to headquarters. The influence of the constituencies, the rank and file, on the Central Offices has been singularly small. It might have been anticipated that federations of local associations would have enabled them to enforce their views on the leaders, if not in respect of party administration, at least in respect of election issues. But, owing largely to the absence of independence of the federation staffs and to the tendency towards concentration of power in the hands of leaders at head-quarters, the local associations have been deprived of much of their possible range of influence. The increase in the numbers of the electorate in recent years has also diminished the representative quality of local associations and consequently reduced their authority.

¹ A number of Conservative local associations retain independence in the nomination of candidates; and consequently the ability of the Central Office to maintain a general direction of election campaigns is impaired.

It does not follow, however, that this course of development has been detrimental to the real interests of the people. The provision of means of communication between the Central Offices and the constituencies, with the ability of the Central Offices to dictate election programmes to candidates, has led to the official definition, and thus to the uniformity of the questions to be put to the electorate. It has been possible for one question or set of questions to be put, instead of a confusing variety of questions. The history of the Newcastle programme is sufficient illustration of the disadvantages of undue initiative on the part of local associations. The people's voice has spoken with less freedom than it would if greater control over the party organizations had been obtained by them; but it has spoken with less ambiguity.

It is, of course, permissible to argue that it would be better for the people to give a doubtful answer to questions of their own asking than a clear answer to questions in which their interest has not been consulted. There is an obvious temptation to politicians to select issues from the point of view of expediency. They can force issues to the front which they anticipate will bring them into power, regardless of their intrinsic worth. They can shelve issues that require decision and action, if they appear to involve exclusion from office. It is sometimes alleged that important measures of reform, respecting, for instance, such matters as divorce, although probably favoured by a large majority of voters, are left in the impotent hands of private members because no party finds them worth undertaking. Party managers are afraid that the inclusion in the party programme of proposals which cut across party divisions may endanger existing allegiances. This is certainly true; but it seems to be one of the inevitable drawbacks to the working of the party system as understood to-day. Nevertheless, non-party measures do from time to time receive the consideration of Parliament; and, on these occasions, the Whips allow members to vote in accordance with their independent opinions.

Objections to the strict discipline imposed by all parties on their members in the House of Commons are obvious; but it must be remembered that, the surer the solidarity of a party, the better it is able to carry out its pledges. Undertakings can be given to the people at general elections with a greater sense of responsibility and are capable of being performed with a greater fidelity if the leaders know that their supposed adherents will stand by them. It is only with a large measure of collaboration between members within their parties that parties can be instruments of democratic government. The difficulties raised by the absence of party discipline in the eighteenth century have been touched upon in section 2 (b) of the preceding chapter.

CHAPTER VII

THE CHOICE OF MINISTRIES¹

§ 1. Ministries dependent on the Crown

AS late as the reign of William III the King not only retained a considerable freedom in the choice of his Ministers, but, in certain respects, he directed their work. William III acted as his own efficient Secretary of State, at least as regards foreign affairs, and, to a less extent, as regards matters of finance. The preference which he displayed for Ministries comprised of members of both parties was doubtless based, in some degree, on a desire to secure financial support from a House of Commons which undeniably occupied a position of enhanced importance. But the selection of Ministers depended chiefly on the King's views regarding the skill, influence, and compliance of the politicians of the day. Such inclinations of the people towards one party or another as were to be gathered from the results of elections of members of Parliament had, at the most, a remote influence on the choice of the King's advisers; and it was, as a rule, only indirectly that the attitude of the House of Commons influenced the composition of the Ministry. Indeed, the King's choice of his advisers was sometimes a determining factor in the membership of the House of Commons. The Whig victory in the elections of 1695 was doubtless largely due to the substitution of Whig for Tory Ministers, which had been proceeding in 1694. Again, in February 1701, the improvement in the position of the Tories in the House of Commons was to some extent attributable to the introduction of Tory Ministers into the Government prior to the election.

As Professor Trevelyan has shown, Queen Anne's chief contribution to the constitutional history of her period was the assertion of her right to choose her Ministers independently of party and of Parliament; and, in her reign too, the composition of the Ministry often had a considerable influence on the membership of the House of Commons rather than the opposite. In 1702 and 1710 her choice (made shortly before general elections) helped to produce Tory majorities. Her habit of arranging alterations in the personnel of her Ministries prior to general elections provides a complete contrast to the principles of the present day.

¹ Reference to the Chart of Parliaments and Ministries (after page 325) is particularly appropriate in connexion with the present chapter. A Chronological Summary of Parliaments and Ministries is also provided in Appendix IV (p. 320 below), for occasional reference.

Although Queen Anne maintained a persistent attitude in regard to the appointment of mixed Ministries, her reign marks the beginning of a dissociation between the Sovereign and the Ministry. The separation between the two led inevitably to a decrease in the initiative of the Sovereign. In fairness to the Queen it must be allowed that the decline in the importance of the position of the Sovereign in her reign was not primarily due to any marked incapacity on her part, except, perhaps, in matters of finance. It is now generally recognized that her obtuseness and stolidity have been overdrawn by many of the older historians. But the accession to the throne of a woman of only moderate gifts at a time when the aspect of foreign politics demanded the highest capacity and statesmanship tended to give the Ministry an identity of its own through its exercise of increased powers. This tendency was accentuated by the fact that the holder of the post of Lord Treasurer, Godolphin, was a man of such outstanding ability that he was well fitted to take upon himself a position of authority not much less than that of a Prime Minister.

The times were ripe for a differentiation between the head of the State and the body responsible for its government. Separation between the Sovereign and the Ministry became inevitable during the reigns of the first two Georges, who were unfitted by reason of their foreign origin to direct the Government, though this very reason caused them to insist on being kept informed of the conduct of foreign policy. During periods of stress, such as that of the Spanish War of 1739 and 1740 and the Seven Years' War, the need for firm direction and vigorous action resulted in a closer association and a more definite integration of the Ministerial body. Under George II the King's free choice of Ministers was seriously undermined, and he was humiliated by the independent attitude of his later Ministries. In particular, the Pelhams found the way to force themselves upon him and to prevent his keeping Carteret as his Minister.

George III was able to re-establish the supreme position of the Sovereign to a limited extent; but, in spite of his determination to 'be a King', he had to submit to a considerable measure of dictation by the Whig families. He always regarded the acceptance of Ministries that were not of his own choice as involving inroads on his prerogative; and he took the earliest opportunity to devise means to turn them out of office. Many politicians still maintained that it was unconstitutional for the King to have a Ministry forced upon him.¹

The large majority obtained by the younger Pitt in the elections of 1784 represented not only a personal triumph for the young Minister, but also a triumph for the King in his assertion of the right to choose his own Ministers; and although this confirmation of the King's choice of Pitt did not imply that in the future the King was to have absolute discretion in respect of the composition of the Cabinet—it was in fact clear that a powerful Minister like Pitt was capable of maintaining himself against the Crown—it meant that, until the era of the great Reform Bill, the Crown retained the power of nominating the Prime Minister and thereby determining in a great measure the composition of the Cabinet. Prior to 1832 the ability of the King to obtain a majority in favour of the Ministry of his choice was a potent factor in enabling him to exercise that choice freely.

In the early years of the nineteenth century George III and George IV (the latter both as Regent and as King) insisted with success on their right to choose their Ministers; and more than one attempt at Cabinet making failed because the views of George IV had been overlooked. It must be borne in mind, however, that the 'group system', into which party government had degenerated in the early nineteenth century, afforded peculiar facilities for the retention of rights which were in fact obsolescent. If there had been two clearly divided parties under George IV, it is doubtful whether he would have been able to sustain his view of the prerogative.

When the disagreement of George III with Pitt on the Roman Catholic question led, among other reasons, to the resignation of Pitt's Ministry in 1801, the retiring Prime Minister made it clear in the most generous fashion, at the time when the appointment of his successor was under consideration, that, in his view, the King's capacity to make free choice of his Ministers was unfettered.

'In no previous instance', he said, 'had it been attempted to be denied that, according to the Constitution, his Majesty had the sole right of nominating his Ministers, and that the House had no right to form any resolution till their conduct came to be judged of by the acts of their administration.'

¹ See, for instance, Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), pp. 581, 594, Selwyn to Lord Carlisle, 19 Feb. and 16 Mar. 1782.

He pointed out that even Fox and his Whig supporters did not, in 1784, contest the King's prerogative of appointment in the abstract, but based their arguments on the absence of support for the new Ministry in a House of Commons which had shown itself, as they alleged, to be in favour of the displaced Ministry; and he added that the existing House of Commons in 1801 was probably in full agreement with the measures of the Ministry which was about to succeed his own.¹

Upon the dismissal by George III of the Ministry of All the Talents in 1807 and its replacement by a Tory Ministry under the Duke of Portland, a protest was raised in the House of Commons, without actually contesting the King's absolute right to the choice of his Ministers. A motion was made, to the effect 'that this House, considering a firm and efficient administration is indispensably necessary, in the present crisis of affairs, had seen with the deepest regret the late change of his Majesty's councils'. Romilly, whose opinion on constitutional matters must be respected, after fully admitting the prerogative of the King, asserted that any choice must be regarded as the outcome of advice; and that the advisers must bear the responsibility. 'It was', he said, 'of the greatest importance to his Majesty that the doctrine of responsible advisers should be strictly maintained.' Lord Howick (afterwards Earl Grey) expressed the views of many who voted in favour of the motion when he said that, while the King's right by his prerogative was acknowledged, the House of Commons had the privilege of giving its opinion on the fitness of a newly appointed Ministry to fill the situation in which it was placed.

It is surprising to find that at so late a date Perceval, on behalf of the new Ministry, resisted the applicability of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility for changes in the Ministry. He cited the case of Ministers being dismissed even through caprice, and asked whether other men were to refuse to succeed them and the Government was to come to a standstill merely as a result of this notion of responsibility. Canning, too, contended that the Ministry could not in common sense be responsible for acts done some weeks before it took office.¹

¹ 35 Parl. Hist. 962.

The appointment of the new Ministry was soon followed by a dissolution; and, although a main object of the appeal to the country was to take advantage of the cry of 'No Popery', a formal issue was submitted with the alleged intention of giving the people an 'opportunity of testifying their determination to support' the King 'in every exercise of the prerogative of his Crown'—which meant, of course, the prerogative of choosing his Ministers.²

That the King's discretion in the choice of Ministers remained unabated in the public view is proved by the general expectation in 1810 that the Prince Regent would, immediately on being put in a position to do so, replace the Tory Ministry by a Whig one. The expectation was not satisfied. On the death, however, of the Tory Prime Minister (Perceval) in 1812 the considerable delay in the appointment of his successor may be attributed to the Whig objections to the Prince's insistence on his power to name the new Prime Minister. The colleagues of the deceased head of the Ministry seemed anxious to cling to office; and an address was moved praying the Prince Regent 'to take such measures as will enable him under the present circumstances of the country to form a strong and efficient administration.'³

In the debate on this motion Canning seems to have attempted to take a judicial view of the constitutional question; and, while framing his opinion, given in the House of Commons, with considerable discretion he implied that it might be better for a House of Commons to give warning of its disapproval of a Ministry at the outset rather than to be forced at a later stage to procure its defeat and removal from office. The latter course would probably be more embarrassing to the Crown than the former.

'I perfectly concur', he said, 'in the general doctrine laid down that it is the exclusive prerogative of the Crown to nominate its own Ministers. I admit that the case must be urgent indeed to authorise the interference of the House; but I cannot forget that Parliament has a double character. The

¹ The anachronistic intervention of the King certainly produced a difficult constitutional problem—one which was only to arise once again (in 1834); and on that occasion, as will be seen, Peel was willing to accept responsibility for what he might well have regarded as an act of caprice.

² 9 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 327 ff., 345, 471-4, 552, 629, 630.

³ 23 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 249.

House of Commons is a council of controul, but it is likewise a council of advice, and I think the man ill-read, not in your journals, but in your Constitution, who should say that no case of such transcendant importance could exist, in which it would not be competent for the legislature, by the timely interposition of advice, to prevent the necessity of controul.¹

He then proceeded to distinguish between a claim of the House of Commons to warn the King that it did not approve of newly appointed Ministers and a claim to assume a final judgement on the suitability of Ministers, by limiting the prerogative right to secure new representatives of the people at any time. The former was a proper claim, whereas the latter was not. He pointed out that, if it had been proposed, as it was in 1784, that the Crown was not entitled to use a discretion in the dissolution of Parliament, it might well have been alleged that the prerogative was being attacked by the House of Commons. But the House of Commons was not proceeding to such lengths.¹

This exposition of principles must have carried considerable weight, coming as it did from one who was known to take a conservative view of the extent of the King's powers. In 1806 Canning had refused an offer by Grenville of a place in the Cabinet on the ground that the King's wishes had not been sufficiently consulted in the formation of the Government.²

By the end of 1830 it was obvious that the country would insist on an early treatment of the subject of Reform. Canningites and moderate reformers placed themselves under Grey, who, with their concurrence, took his place as leader of the Opposition immediately the new Parliament met in October 1830. When, therefore, Wellington resigned on being defeated in the House of Commons in the following month, the King had no alternative but to appoint Grey as Prime Minister. On this historic occasion his freedom of choice was non-existent; and, in this respect, as in others, it was evident that a new era had set in. As Sir Robert Peel complained in a debate on the Reform Bill:

¹ 23 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 267.

² His forbearance from infringing in any way on the freedom of the King's exercise of his prerogative of choice of Ministers was probably the explanation of his own appointment as Prime Minister in 1827 instead of Wellington or Peel. Owing to the retirement of Liverpool, who had succeeded in holding together discordant elements, George IV found himself in possession of an embarrassingly wide range of choice. He gained the impression that Wellington and Peel were adopting a dictatorial attitude; and, feeling that his free discretion was endangered, he decided to entrust the formation of the new Ministry to Canning.

'How could the King hereafter change a Ministry? How could he make a partial change in the administration, in times of public excitement, with any prospect that the Ministers of his choice, unpopular perhaps from the strict performance of necessary duties, would be returned to Parliament?'¹

Nevertheless, William IV, oblivious of the implications arising out of the passing of the Reform Act, took it upon himself, in 1834, so to encourage the resignation of the Melbourne Ministry as almost to amount to a signification of dismissal. He did this in the hope that his appointment of a new Prime Minister would lead, as it had in the past, to an assured majority for the Minister of his choice in a new Parliament. The failure of Peel (Melbourne's successor) to secure such a majority meant a death-blow to the power of the King to nominate his Ministers, and would have involved him in considerably greater embarrassment than it did, if the discussion of the constitutional question in the House of Commons had not led to a reaffirmation of the principle of the impersonal aspect of the King's actions of a political character.

This principle was not, it seems, that adopted by Wellington immediately after the change of Ministry, and even later. He wrote to Peel, on hearing of Melbourne's removal, that he did not think that Peel and he were responsible for the quarrel. It was, he said, 'an affair quite settled' when the King sent for him.²

When Parliament met again, after the dissolution which had been advised by Peel as soon as he had been appointed Prime Minister, it was natural that the circumstances of the change of Ministry should be discussed in both Houses in the course of the debates on the Address. In the House of Lords Melbourne asserted that, since the change was determined upon by the King and carried into effect by the counsel and advice of the Duke of Wellington (acting on Peel's behalf), the Duke of Wellington was properly responsible. The Duke denied this, and tried to suggest that the King's action could be explained as the natural outcome of the attitude of Melbourne himself towards his late colleagues. Brougham insisted that Wellington was responsible, since the King was incapable of acting save through responsible advisers; and that those who succeeded a dismissed Ministry were necessarily responsible for the dismissal.

¹ 11 Parl. Deb., 35, 757.

² Peel, Memoirs, vol ii, p. 23.

Peel did not give any public indication of the fact that he disliked the King's treatment of the late Ministry. His method of dealing with the criticisms of the Liberals in the House of Commons was masterly. He knew that the days of impeachments were virtually past; and he adopted what was at one and the same time the boldest and the safest course. He did not attempt to adopt the same line of defence as Wellington's or as that taken by the Ministers in 1807.

'I have been asked', he said, 'whether I would impose on the King in his personal capacity the responsibility of the dismissal of that Government. In answer to this question I will at once declare that I claim all the responsibility which properly belongs to me as a public man; I am responsible for the assumption of the duty which I have undertaken, and, if you please, I am, by my acceptance of office, responsible for the removal of the late Government.'

He proceeded, however, after observing that his recent absence from the country, in Italy, prevented his having in fact given the advice that the late Ministry should be dismissed, to attempt, not very convincingly, to justify the dismissal. The retirement of Lord Althorp, he suggested, provided a natural opportunity for the King to review the constitution of his Ministry.¹

Although the constitutional difficulties which were raised by the King's ineptitude were disposed of as a result of the turn taken in the debate, it was at once clear that the Sovereign could never again act in the autocratic manner adopted by William IV. And the assumption of Ministerial responsibility by Peel can only have emphasized that this phase of monarchical government had come to a definite end; for it must have been apparent that not even the most brazen Opposition leader could undertake to advise the King to dismiss his existing Prime Minister and to appoint himself.

Even at the present day, the King, although normally bound to appoint as Prime Minister the acknowledged leader of the party approved by the people, may in peculiar circumstances, such as those which prevailed in 1923, when Mr. Baldwin and Lord Curzon were both possible appointees to the premiership, still have to choose between leaders who are qualified for the post. Queen Victoria, on one occasion, passed over the person who was generally regarded as entitled to the appointment. On the final retirement of Gladstone in 1894 it might have been expected that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir William Harcourt, who had in point of service undeniable claims, would have been chosen as Prime Minister. Gladstone had some reason, based on the manner in which constitutional usage had developed, to expect that his advice as retiring Prime Minister would be taken. He had intended, if consulted, to advise the Queen to send for Lord Spencer. But the Queen, on her own responsibility and without consulting the retiring Prime Minister, as has been usual in doubtful cases, sent for Lord Rosebery, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and entrusted him with the formation of the new Ministry. Earlier in her reign, in 1859, she had endeavoured to pass over the person who had the most obvious claim to the office of Prime Minister, Palmerston, and to appoint Granville, a more amenable person. But the failure of the latter to construct a Ministry forced her to entrust the Government to the former. This discrimination between politicians of the same party is of a very different character to the removal of a Ministry, when in possession of a majority in Parliament, such as took place in 1834.

¹ 26 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 76, 83, 89, 215-20, 257.

It may be added that, if it should happen that the two-party system should be superseded by a system of groups, the King's obligation to select his Prime Minister not only may become more frequent, but may involve him in a much wider discretion than that which he has exercised for the last hundred years.

There may be occasions, too, when the coalition of parties will impose on the King the choice of a Prime Minister. If the coalition is one of individuals rather than of parties the extension of the King's powers may prove to be a very serious one, since the King in these circumstances has not merely to choose one of the leaders of the party approved by the majority of the constituencies, but to choose an individual in his own discretion. How far these remarks have any application to the formation of the Ministry which took office in August 1931 is not yet clear.

§ 2. Ministries dependent on the House of Commons

The change in the political centre of gravity, from the King towards the House of Commons, which was, in spite of occasional checks, a marked feature of the constitutional history of the eighteenth century, can be largely attributed to Walpole. Not only was he a thorough 'House of Commons man', but he was also the earliest effective exponent of the doctrine of cabinet solidarity and collective responsibility. Even his resignation in 1742, on the defeat of his Ministry in the House of Commons, pointed a way by which the House could extend its power over the life of the Ministry. Competition between the King and the aristocracy, however, prevented these principles from being steadily developed. It is true that the whole Pelham Ministry resigned in 1746, so as to force the King to accept its views; but the resignation savoured rather of stratagem than of recognition of a point of principle.

It was in the interest of the Whig families, in their endeavour to replace a monarchy by an aristocracy, to maintain the dependence of the Ministry on a majority in the House of Commons; but the middle of the eighteenth century was not a period favourable to the liberalization of the Constitution. Half of the reign of George III passed before Lord Chancellor Thurlow's insubordination was checked by the younger Pitt and the joint and several responsibility of members of the Ministry became a recognized and settled factor. Before that stage was reached Ministers frequently acted in opposition to their own colleagues. Chatham's second Ministry, which George III hoped to be devoid of party colour and entirely dependent on himself, was an instance of the extent to which reaction could go. This Ministry was an administration 'by departments', after the old model which had prevailed just a hundred years before. Chatham had formed the Ministry on the King's prescription of avoiding all party ties; the result was that the members of the Ministry did not loyally pursue any common policy; and some of them acted in open revolt against their chief. Conway, for instance, in 1766, insisted on adopting an attitude of independence from his colleagues and frequently voted against them; and, in the same year, Townshend intrigued against his chief and even went to the length of maintaining, in direct opposition to the Ministerial view, the propriety of taxing the American colonies. This kind of indiscipline was regarded, even contemporaneously, as improper. Chatham, however, had himself assailed the measures of his colleagues in 1755, so that he was hardly in a position to complain.

At the time of the Fox-North Coalition of 1783 Fox urged upon North that the King should not be allowed to act as his own Minister. North replied:

'If you mean there should not be a government by departments, I agree with you. I think it a very bad system. There should be one man or a Cabinet to govern and direct every measure. Government by departments was not brought in by me. I found it so, and had not the vigour or resolution to put an end to it.'¹

It is obvious that, until corporate responsibility became established, Ministries did not regard themselves as dependent on a majority in the House of Commons. Although the King could usually contrive to have a majority for the Ministers of his choice, they occasionally suffered defeat on matters of importance without feeling it incumbent on them to resign, and sometimes even without the Opposition expecting or suggesting that they should do so. A notable instance of this attitude is, naturally enough, found in the course of the second Ministry of Chatham, to which reference has just been made. The Ministers in their budget proposals of 1767 fixed the land-tax at the high figure of four shillings in the pound. The Opposition proposed to reduce the tax to three shillings; and this amendment was carried with the support of some members of the Ministry. Although the Government was thus defeated on a financial measure of importance, the Ministers did not resign. A few years later, between 1780 and 1782, Lord North's Ministry, which was kept in office by the combined prayers and threats of George III, was defeated on several occasions without yielding up office. On one of these occasions, the strangeness of the circumstance of defeat, but not of the absence of resignation, was remarked upon by the younger Pitt, at the age of twenty in a letter to his mother. He described it as a 'great phenomenon'.²

It may well be imagined that the King would have treated with scorn any suggestion that his Ministers' position should regularly depend on the votes of the House of Commons, even in respect of vital questions. There was still current the old principle that it was the duty of members of Parliament in general to support the King's Ministry. In so far as legislative measures were concerned, a party programme was unessential, so that defeats in regard to proposals for legislation were not of so much consequence as they are to-day, when a positive policy is the very back-bone of a Government's existence. No example can, in fact, be found prior to 1830 of a Ministry retiring because it was beaten on a question of legislation or even of taxation.

¹ Memorials and Correspondence of C. J. Fox, vol. ii, p. 38. By the phrase 'government by departments' he implied that the head of the Ministry acted as little more than the chief agent of the Sovereign.

² Stanhope, Life of Pitt (1861 ed.), vol. i, p. 28.

The relations of the Ministry to the Crown, the House of Commons, and the people were fully discussed in the early months of 1784, that is to say immediately after the younger Pitt had been given office, although in a minority in the House of Commons. Charles James Fox was the chief exponent of the view that a Ministry in a minority could not continue to hold office, but should resign. During a debate in January 1784 he remarked that,

'although it is undoubtedly the prerogative of his Majesty to appoint his Ministers, it may still be a point worthy of consideration how far it may be prudent, wise and politic in a monarch to continue them in power, and support them in office, when they are declared by that House to have been elevated to their station by means unconstitutional, and such as have rendered them unworthy of confidence.'

Pitt's reply to these contentions includes a justification to the effect that he believed that his Ministry, although not at the moment commanding a majority in the House of Commons, was possessed of the confidence of the nation. But he did not say that he was prepared at that moment to put his belief to the test by advising a dissolution. On the contrary, he soon gave a somewhat ambiguous assurance, on being pressed by the Opposition, which wanted resignation and not dissolution, that he had no intention of obtaining an early dissolution. It is a matter of general agreement that his retention of office, though capable of being vindicated on very broad grounds, cannot be reconciled with constitutional principles. Pitt told the House that, although he had the profoundest respect for it, there was 'nothing illegal in a Minister's remaining in office after that House had declared against him, particularly where immediate resignation would have injured the country. . . . To have resigned immediately . . . would have been to let in the Ministers, who, however they might enjoy the confidence of that House, he believed had not the confidence of the nation'

Perhaps the best justifications of Pitt's retention of office in a minority were, first, that he was making a sustained effort to gain a majority and was displaying evidence of his improved prospects, and, secondly, that he was not only entitled, but to some extent bound, to complete the business of the session before advising a dissolution.

In a further debate on 1 March 1784 Fox reiterated his arguments with the object of demonstrating that the House of Commons, 'stationed as sentinels by the people', had power to insist on the resignation of the Ministry; and, on this occasion, he, in his turn, gave consideration to popular arguments and contended that it was the interest of the people which was at the root of the attitude of the Opposition. 'We wish', he insisted, 'to increase the weight of the people in the Constitution; your object [turning to the Ministry] is to lessen their weight.'

In answer to these contentions, Pitt adopted expedients which were as specious as Fox's were disingenuous. He claimed that a Ministry was not bound to resign after a vote of general non-confidence, but that it was necessary for the House to specify particular charges. A Ministry, he said, should not be capriciously condemned until its incapacity had been proved.¹ When Pitt felt the time was ripe—towards the end of March 1784—he advised a dissolution. For the first time a Minister chosen by the Crown, who had not a majority in Parliament, appealed to the people in a manner which implied that the decision rested with them. But the claims of the King to the free choice of his Ministers, and the denial by the Whigs of the right of Pitt to advise what Burke described as a 'penal dissolution', tended to confuse the character of the development in constitutional usage. In some respects even the results of the incidents of 1784 were reactionary, since the House of Commons was flouted and the King's claims sustained at the expense of those of the Whigs.

For a short further period the notion still prevailed that Ministers chosen by the Sovereign should not be opposed by members of Parliament immediately after their appointment on merely personal or general grounds, and that they should be given a fair opportunity of proving whether their administration was acceptable to the House or not. After a few years Pitt's view was proved to be untenable, and the House of Commons was to secure an unqualified right to withhold its confidence from Ministers.¹

¹ 24 Parl. Hist. 364, 365, 432, 433, 483, 690, 709, 710.

The principle of the dependence of the Ministry on the representatives of the people, although having its roots extending well back into the eighteenth century, was not fully recognized for some years after the passing of the first Reform Act. The earliest vote of censure, which took the form of the modern vote of non-confidence, seems to have been proposed at the end of North's Ministry in 1782. And, as has been remarked, there was no plain example of a Ministry resigning because it was defeated in the House of Commons prior to 1830. Walpole's resignation in 1742, which is mentioned elsewhere in this book,² is, owing to the personal nature of the attack on the Minister and from other circumstances, such as the incomplete change in the composition of the new Ministry, unsuitable to be regarded as a precedent. Again, it is hardly useful to draw any conclusions from the resignation of Shelburne in 1783, an event in which lack of support from his colleagues had much to do. Even Wellington's resignation, in 1830, followed an unimportant defeat, which was seized upon by the Ministers themselves as an expedient for leaving office on some subject other than Reform.

After the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, however, the question of the importance to the Ministry of maintaining a majority in the House of Commons became a very real one. When, in 1834, Peel was appointed Prime Minister in succession to Melbourne, in circumstances which have already been mentioned, he immediately dissolved Parliament and gained some accession of strength in the House of Commons, but not sufficient to provide him with a majority. He remained in office for some weeks, suffering several defeats in the House. It was at this time that he made his famous appeal for a 'fair trial'; and he had, perhaps, some ground for complaint that he was continually being threatened with votes of non-confidence, which were never brought forward. His opponents preferred to resort to more indirect expedients and pretended to abstain from votes of censure, in order to enable the Ministry to introduce its programme of legislation. Nevertheless, Lord John Russell, who led the Opposition in the House of Commons, characterized Peel's retention of office as 'extraordinary', a charge which led Peel to assert that the adverse votes were, so to speak, accidental and did not imply lack of confidence.¹

¹ Cf. Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. v, p. 251.

² See pp. 105, 112 above and p. 160 below.

Peel, however, soon realized that it was unconstitutional to continue, for more than a short time, to conduct the Government with a minority in the House of Commons. 'Nothing can, in my opinion,' he said in a memorandum addressed to his colleagues, 'justify the administration in persevering against a majority, but a rational and well-founded hope of acquiring additional support and converting a minority into a majority.' Unlike Pitt in 1784, he saw no ground for entertaining such a hope. Moreover, Pitt had continued in a minority while waiting for the suitable moment for a dissolution; whereas Peel had gone to the country immediately after his appointment. After some seven weeks' struggle he decided that it would be improper to disregard any longer the steady opposition of the House of Commons, and he resigned.

A situation which was in some respects similar arose in 1841. The tables were then turned. The Melbourne Ministry, for which Russell was leader in the House of Commons, suffered a series of defeats without resigning; and Peel finally moved a vote of non-confidence. The considerable length of the debate and the energy expended, in discussing whether the defeats already suffered were vital to the Ministry or not, are to be explained by the incomplete recognition of the dependence of the Ministry on the House of Commons up to that time.

Peel reviewed, in support of his motion, the circumstances of the reverses of the Liberal Ministry; and he asserted that its continuance in office without the confidence of the House, which he denied to be possessed by the Ministry, was 'at variance with the principles and spirit of the Constitution'. He quoted, in support of his argument, the resignation of Walpole in 1742, of North in 1782, and of himself in 1835, the last after carrying on 'for a short time an unequal contest in opposition to the power leagued against me'. It may be remarked, parenthetically, that the instances of 1742 and 1782 do not carry much weight. The former has already been noticed, and, in the latter, North had for a long time been trying vainly to persuade the King to liberate him; and, when the vote on the motion of non-confidence was taken in 1782, North retained a small majority.

¹ 26 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 471, 474.

In reply to Peel the supporters of the Melbourne Ministry adduced many examples of previous Ministries remaining in office after defeats in the House of Commons, several of them inapposite owing to their remoteness in time, if for no other reason. There were mentioned, among other instances, those of Sunderland's defeat on the Peerage Bill in 1717, North's defeat on Dunning's motion, Pitt's defeat on Reform and on the Fortification Resolutions, Liverpool's defeat on the Property Tax and the Bill of Pains and Penalties against Queen Caroline, and Wellington's defeat on a motion for repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts.

It was, however, obvious that a defence could not be made to rest solely on precedents for the entire disregard of adverse votes in the House of Commons. A distinction was, therefore, drawn between the confidence of the House of Commons in general administration and in proposals for legislation. It was contended by Macaulay that a Ministry was not bound to resign because it could not obtain a majority for its legislative projects, unless such a failure involved an inability to carry on the public service.

A similar justification for disregarding the voting in the House of Commons as a determining factor in the life of a Ministry was advanced with much insistence at a later stage in the debate by Lord John Russell. He pointed out that, in the time of Walpole, Chatham, Pitt, and Fox, very little legislation was undertaken and that the function of a Ministry was largely confined to administration. There had been no obligation to introduce legislative changes until after the passing of the Reform Bill. It was unreasonable, he argued, that a Government should possess 'the same general uniform support which was required when Ministries had merely acts of administration to perform'.

This laboured argument, although it included an accurate description of the principles and practice of the eighteenth century, was based too much on a comparison of the past with the present to be convincing. Precedents drawn from the period prior to the first Reform Act were for the most part beside the mark. Russell's argument might be construed as a plea that, although the constitutional situation had changed, the relation of the Ministry to the House of Commons ought to remain the same as it had been a hundred years before.

The contentions of Macaulay and Russell were effectively dealt with by Peel in the reply which closed the debate. Peel protested that it was not fair for a Ministry to have the power of excluding any legislative measures it liked from those on which an adverse vote would imply a lack of confidence. This was a power which should reside in the House of Commons only. Macaulay's doctrine, that it was the main duty of a Ministry to administer the law and that in this way it could claim the right to show itself indifferent to defeats on legislative proposals, was 'so unconstitutional, so dangerous a doctrine' as he ever heard maintained. Peel strongly repudiated the suggestion that the confidence of the House was based on the record of administration rather than that of legislation. In the first place, the two were 'so interwoven' as 'to render it utterly impossible to draw a line of distinction between them'. And, further, Peel said, 'the character of an Administration and their claim upon public confidence is infinitely stronger on account of their legislative measures, than on account of their administrative acts'. And he pointed to the way in which recent politics had been overshadowed by the importance of such legislation as that respecting Roman Catholic Relief, Parliamentary Reform, and the Poor Law.¹

Peel's view of the constitutional position was the modern one. And, as regards the distinction between administrative and legislative functions, the claim that a Ministry depends more on its legislative than on its administrative policy is, in so far as the two can be distinguished, more forcible nowadays than it was at the period of Peel and Russell. Few great administrative changes or reforms can now be carried through without legislative action.

A cardinal principle was secured as a result of the debate on Peel's motion of non-confidence in 1841. In subsequent years discussions have taken place, when no motion of non-confidence was before the House, whether or not a particular defeat was fatal to the life of the Ministry; but it has never again been necessary, in debating a motion of censure, to attempt to establish, with so large a reference to precedent as that made in 1841, that defeats in respect of legislative proposals may raise the implication of a lack of confidence.

In discussions subsequent to 1841 hardly any real doubt has been thrown on the dependence of a Ministry on a majority in the House of Commons. In 1852, when Derby struggled through a session, although in a minority, Russell contended that the retention of office was unconstitutional; and Gladstone argued, on the same side, that the Opposition was entitled to demand from the Government 'a distinct assurance that after the despatch of necessary business . . . the Crown should be advised to appeal to the country'. Derby explained that he did not place reliance on the precedent of 1784, which was peculiar, but that he did rely on the precedent of Peel's retention of office in 1835. At the same time, however, he expressed his anxiety to appeal to the people as soon as that course was consistent with the public welfare.¹

¹ 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 803 ff., 881, 885, 1195, 1222-4.

Disraeli, after being beaten on the Irish Church question in 1867, retained office for several months because of the necessity for the completion of legislation and the drawing up of the new registers under the recent Reform measure prior to a dissolution. Although he was criticized by the Opposition for acting unconstitutionally in certain particulars, it was not suggested that he was acting in disregard of the will of the House of Commons. In reply to allegations that he was merely making excuses for clinging to power, he challenged the Opposition to move a vote of want of confidence, a challenge that was not accepted.

An elaborate review of the difficulties that face a Ministry, in determining whether a particular defeat is one of a character to require resignation or dissolution, was provided by Balfour in a statement to the House immediately after the defeat of his Ministry on a vote upon the Estimates in July 1905. No motion of censure was before the House, but the usual clamour for resignation was raised. Balfour observed that there appeared to be in many quarters of the House an idea that the accepted constitutional principle was that, when a Government suffered defeat, in Supply or on any other subject, the proper course for the Ministry to adopt was either to resign or to dissolve Parliament. But he asserted that 'the most superficial acquaintance with the Parliamentary history of this country' disproved such a view. He then proceeded to catalogue a series of instances of defeats followed neither by resignation nor by dissolution; and he naturally emphasized the instances in which Liberal Ministries were concerned.

'Lord Melbourne's administration,' he said, 'up to its resignation in 1839, suffered many defeats. Between its acceptance of office in the same year and its final expulsion from office in 1841, its life was a continual series of defeats. . . . But even this was not sufficient to decide Ministers to resign their offices. It required a formal vote of censure, shortly afterwards, proposed by Sir Robert Peel, to induce them to abandon their responsibilities as Ministers of the Crown.'

¹ 119 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1067, 1105, 1276 ff.

Balfour pointed out, among other instances, nine defeats in Gladstone's Ministry of 1868-74 and to Rosebery's defeat on the Address at the beginning of his tenure of office. The principle he extracted from his long list of examples was that, a defeat on a vote of non-confidence being admitted as conclusive, other defeats might or might not be conclusive according to the nature of the attendant circumstances.¹

Dicey, among other authorities, has admitted that the principles deciding what defeats necessitate resignation or dissolution are obscure; and it is certainly not easy to see how any more definite standards than the present ones can be laid down, unless it is to be understood that a formal vote of censure or non-confidence is to be considered as essential before a Ministry is under the necessity of yielding up office.

There has been, in the past, some discussion regarding the ability of the House of Commons to ensure that no Ministry shall remain in office against the will of the House by means of refusal to grant Supplies or to pass the Mutiny Act. This 'ultimate legal sanction' is unlikely ever again to come within the sphere of practical politics. Now that it is fully admitted that a Ministry cannot continue its career in disregard of a clear intimation that it no longer possesses the confidence of the House of Commons, the application of this sanction, crude and clumsy as it is, seems to be unnecessary. It has, in fact, become well understood that a Ministry ought not to be coerced by threats of a refusal to provide requisite funds for carrying on the government. The threat of Fox in 1784 ended ignominiously; and more recent insinuations, made in the nineteenth century, that, unless the Ministry yielded, Supplies might be stopped, do not reflect credit on their authors.

§ 3. Ministries dependent on the people

One or two writers have regarded the circumstances of the election of 1741 as expressive of an advance towards democratic government. It has been said, for instance, that this election was 'the first upon which it was distinctly understood that the fate of an administration depended'.¹ But the motion for the removal of Walpole, which was signally defeated only a few weeks before his reverses in the election of 1741, was not intended by its supporters to be an attack on the whole administration, though Walpole alleged in his defence that, if there had been faults of policy, they were those of the Council or even of Parliament as a whole. It is certainly true that there was considerable talk in the course of the speeches of the supporters of the motion regarding the anxiety of the people to show their disapproval of the 'First Minister'; and charges of maladministration undoubtedly coloured the election campaign, with the result that there arose a popular issue of unusually vivid interest. The issue, however, was rather that of confidence or non-confidence in Walpole than that of confidence or non-confidence in the Ministry; and even the personal issue cannot be said to have been plainly decided as a result of the election.

¹ 150 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 49 ff.

When the election of 1741 was over, the usual uncertainty prevailed regarding the comparative strength of the Ministerial and Opposition sides. The Opposition could not immediately hail the result as a victory. There was, however, reason for them to be hopeful. 'Sir Robert must be alarmed at our numbers,' wrote Chesterfield to Dodington, 'and must resolve to reduce them before they are brought into the field.'² After Parliament had sat for some days, Walpole still maintained that he would have a majority; and he spent the Christmas recess, as did also the Opposition, feverishly trafficking for votes. The turning of the balance against Walpole was not so much the result of votes cast by members who had stood in opposition to Walpole at the elections, as of the abstentions of his old supporters, who were waiting to see which was the promising side to support.³

Evidence for the absence of any effective decision on the merits of the administration, at the election of 1741, can be found in the incomplete changes which were made in the composition of the Ministry after Walpole's retirement and the maintenance of, or at least the eventual acquiescence in, many of his principles of home government. The attack of the Opposition was centred on Walpole himself, who, by his self-sufficient attitude and by his long period of power, had aroused a peculiarly keen animosity against him in a group of ambitious politicians. Many years were to pass before cleaner politics, greater enlightenment, and a more straightforward working of the party system were to enable the people to have any direct and recognized influence on the fate of Ministries.

¹ Blauvelt, Development of Cabinet Government in England, p. 208; and see pp. 105, 113 above. With regard to the election of 1734, see p. 239 (note 1) below.

² Cox, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. iii, p. 579.

³ Letters of Horace Walpole (ed. Toynbee), vol. i, pp. 141, 147, 156.

The few occasions in the eighteenth century when the change of Ministries can in any way be attributed to the influence of the people were those when public opinion, aroused by serious situations in politics, displayed a strong antagonism to particular Ministers at times other than those of general elections. The artificial majorities of the reigns of George II and George III were not always sufficient to impose on the people Ministers of whom they did not approve. The majority in the House of Commons might be unshaken; but there was felt to be an Opposition outside the House which could not be neglected. In 1756 Newcastle, and in 1763 Bute, resigned, chiefly it may be presumed, because they were unable to face the clamour of the people; and North finally secured his freedom from office in similar circumstances in 1782.¹

It was not until much later that the preference of a majority of the constituencies for one party or the other decided which set of politicians should take office. From the middle of the nineteenth century the people exercised an increasing ability to decide the character of the Ministry to hold office by means of their voting at general elections. In such a period, say, as that between 1870 and 1910, during which the two-party system was to a considerable extent effective, it sometimes happened that a Ministry which obtained a large majority at a general election managed to survive the whole period of a Parliament without suffering serious defeats. The increase in the closeness of party discipline had assisted this development. In these circumstances, the dependence of the Ministry on the House of Commons diminished; and the function of the House became rather that of keeping Ministers in office than of watching to turn them out. As a result, the life of the Ministry has grown more and more dependent on the outcome of the people's voting at general elections, it being understood that Ministries should resign immediately if it has become clear that their majority has been lost.

¹ L. B. Namier, England in the Age of the American Revolution, vol. i, pp. 179-80. For the inferences to be drawn from the circumstances of the election of 1784, see p. 107 above, and pp. 196-8 below.

The circumstances surrounding the election of 1841 mark an intermediate stage in the development. Prior to that time the Ministry depended, as has been observed, on the King or only mediately on the people through the House of Commons. But, from 1841 onwards, the people's verdict in a general election came to be talked of as the determining factor in the choice of the Ministry. In and after 1868 that verdict was, in all clear cases, absolute.

Melbourne's advice to Queen Victoria in 1841 and the attitude adopted by her as a result of that advice demonstrate a failure, almost rivalling that of William IV, to understand the current movement towards democratic control of government. Melbourne told the Queen that the return of a majority in favour of the Opposition would be 'an affront to the Crown'; and the Queen so completely accepted this view of the function of a general election that, in writing to Lord John Russell five years later, she mentioned the dissolution of Parliament as a valuable instrument in the hands of the Crown, which should only be used 'with a certainty of success'. The letter proceeds: 'The Queen strongly feels that she made a mistake in allowing the dissolution in 1841; the result has been a majority returned against her of nearly one hundred votes.'¹ Neither the Queen nor Melbourne seems to have interpreted the events connected with the passing of the Reform Bill as pointing towards the ability of the people to choose between alternative Ministries without any regard to the views of the Sovereign.

The elections of 1841 resulted in the return of a large majority opposed to Melbourne. He determined to meet Parliament for the reason that the opinion of members could not constitutionally be inferred, save as a result of voting in the House of Commons. When Parliament met and an amendment was moved in the House of Lords to the effect that the Ministry had not the confidence of the House of Commons and of the country, Lord Melbourne remarked:

'The meaning of this motion in plain English is, "we [the Opposition] have now a majority in the House of Commons". To judge by some of the declarations at the hustings, I suppose there is such a majority. At the same time it must be recollected that members are sent ad consultandum de rebus arduis regni. We are not, therefore, to judge what the conduct of members may be by their declarations on the hustings.'¹

¹ Letters of Queen Victoria, 1st Series, vol. ii, pp. 107-8.

The amendment to the Address in the House of Commons was carried against the Melbourne Ministry by a majority of over ninety. Disraeli, when speaking in this debate, argued that Melbourne's proper course should have been to have resigned after the vote of lack of confidence recorded in the last Parliament and, in particular, after the country had confirmed the judgement of Parliament by their votes in the elections. The Liberals pointed to Peel's retention of office for some weeks in 1835; but Disraeli distinguished that occasion on the ground that Peel had not been subjected to a vote of non-confidence. It was evident that Disraeli was nearly, if not quite, alone in his advanced interpretation of constitutional usage. Lord Broughton observed, in his Recollections of a Long Life,² that both Graham and Stanley, on Disraeli's side, gave a negative shake of the head when Disraeli made his point.

In 1866 the Conservatives, although in a minority, came into office in the course of a Parliament in which the Liberals, divided on the question of Reform, had been bound to resign after a few months of power. But the Conservatives did not, in accordance with the convention of the present day, at once advise a dissolution and appeal to the people. They remained in office for more than two years and secured the passing of the Reform Act of 1867. In 1868 they advised a dissolution; and, on suffering a clear defeat in the election, they immediately resigned without waiting to meet Parliament. This resignation has been described as 'a mark in the constitutional history of the country'. As Spencer Walpole observed:

'It is the first open recognition in history that the House of Commons itself was of less importance than the electors. . . . The first election in which all borough householders were entitled to take part was the first election whose decision, without any parliamentary confirmation, decided the fate of a Ministry.'³

The Queen, instead of clinging as long as possible to her Ministers, saw that it would be more dignified and less painful both to her and to Disraeli to assent to immediate resignation. In her letter to Gladstone, in which she charged him with the formation of a Ministry, she said:

¹ 59 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 71.

² Vol. vi, p. 40.

³ History of Twenty-five Years, vol. ii, p. 347. See also the views of Freeman, quoted in A. Todd, Parliamentary Government, vol. i, p. 244.

'Mr. Disraeli has tendered his resignation to the Queen. The result of the appeal to the country is too evident to require its being proved by a vote in Parliament, and the Queen entirely agrees with Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues in thinking that the most dignified course for them to pursue, as also the best for the public interests, is immediate resignation.'¹

The precedent set in 1868 has been followed by both parties on every occasion in which the two-party system has been in plain operation. But some few years elapsed before it was freely admitted that it was the decision of the people, and not merely convenience, which dictated this course.

In 1885 and in 1892 Salisbury did not immediately resign, although in each case he was clearly in a minority as the result of the general election. But on these occasions, as in the more recent instance of Mr. Baldwin in 1923, the Opposition was not composed of a single party; and it was only reasonable that any doubts, dependent on the reassortment of groups or parties, should be left to the determination of the voting in Parliament. In 1885 Salisbury wrote to the Queen:

'Lord Salisbury is clearly of opinion that no case has arisen, or is likely to arise, for resignation in anticipation of a Parliamentary vote. Even if the Liberals should obtain a clear majority in the whole House, which does not seem probable, they are too disunited to justify the Conservatives in admitting that the country has voted for a change of government. The practice introduced by Lord Beaconsfield in 1868, though it has been followed twice since, is a grave departure from the older constitutional usage, and should not be perpetuated when it can be avoided.'²

Beaconsfield's resignation immediately after the election of 1880 was an obvious sequel to the precedent of 1868; but the circumstances surrounding the similar resignation of Gladstone in 1874 indicate that both the Queen and Gladstone had a very imperfect conception of the true inferences to be drawn from the change in practice. Gladstone wrote to Lord Granville on 7 February 1874:

'There are four precedents of our own time [for waiting to meet Parliament]—1835, 1841, 1852, 1859, under three Ministers. The only case the other way is that of 1868 of which the circumstances were altogether peculiar. . . . It is Parliament,

¹ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, p. 252.

² Letters of Queen Victoria, 2nd Series, vol. iii, p. 707.

not the constituencies, that ought to dismiss the Government, and the proper function of the House of Commons cannot be taken from it without diminishing somewhat its dignity and authority.'¹

On 13 February 1874 the Queen told Lord Granville that, in her opinion,

'there is a general feeling that the resignation, which is quite inevitable, should take place as soon as they [the elections] are over. The Queen must say that she herself is decidedly of this opinion. Indeed, she could not physically go through the work and fatigue necessitated by a change of government at the same time as the arrival of the young couple takes place [the marriage of her second son to the daughter of the Emperor of Russia]'.²

The Queen's approval of the immediate resignation of 1868 had been affected in some degree by a desire to save Disraeli from embarrassment; and, in 1874, a desire to rid herself of Gladstone as swiftly as possible may have consciously or unconsciously affected her opinion.

Gladstone replied to the Queen that he had no doubt whatever that the course of meeting Parliament was the one most agreeable to usage, and to the rules of Parliamentary government; and that any departure from it could only be justified upon grounds in their nature exceptional. He thought that the problem before him, like that of 1868, might be exceptional on account of the state of general opinion and of the convenience of the incoming administration. But he felt that resignation without an adverse vote, if made a general rule, might enable a delinquent Government to escape condemnation by Parliament, since the adverse party was seldom inclined to attack a fallen Government.² This argument for retaining the old practice is a little difficult to understand. It is hardly to be supposed that a party which had been victorious at the polls would keep the defeated Ministry in office while an inquiry was being pursued regarding its past guilt.

The explanation given by Gladstone in the House of Commons of the reasons for his resignation in 1874 without meeting Parliament throws some light on his attitude. He was, he said, actuated by motives of convenience. If he had decided to retain office and meet the House of Commons, the business of the House would have been very considerably delayed, and, in consequence, the legislative programme of the Session seriously impeded. He gave no indication that any broader considerations had affected his decision.¹

¹ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 492-3.

² Letters of Queen Victoria, 2nd Series, vol. ii, pp. 315, 316, 318.

His determination, in 1886, to resign immediately after the election did not display any fuller appreciation of the significance of constitutional developments. The reasons given by him for the action taken on that occasion were concerned with an interest for the best welfare of Ireland, with the reunion of the Liberal Party, but not with the decisive element in the voting of the electorate.²

It must be remembered that, only a century ago, evenly matched struggles between two sides in an election contest were unknown. At that time the King's chosen Ministry automatically won the day. It is a little surprising, therefore, to find Gladstone cherishing the traditions of the House of Commons in respect of the choice of Ministries with such reverent care. The adoption of the practice of immediate resignation, soon after the period when square fights became possible, suggests that the growth of democratic control is not the only explanation of the acceptance of the election result as the determining factor. To some extent the practice of not waiting for the decision of Parliament may be attributed to the sensible attitude of a combatant, who, seeing himself beaten, wishes out of regard for his reputation to admit the fact without further ado. There is little doubt that this consideration was a factor in determining Disraeli to create the precedent of 1868.

The failure of the Conservative Ministry, in 1866, to advise a dissolution and to appeal to the people, immediately after the resignation of the Liberals, has been mentioned above as a late example of the practice of the old régime, under which a change of Ministry did not involve a general election. Nowadays, whenever the two-party system is in operation, the decision of the people is invoked not only when a Minister who is outvoted in the House of Commons anticipates that he retains a majority in the constituencies, but also when a defeated Minister voluntarily gives up office without advising a dissolution. The new Minister takes the earliest opportunity of submitting a choice of Ministries to the electorate; and this is an additional evidence of the enlarged powers of the people and a corresponding decline in the powers of the

¹ 218 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 128-9.

² Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. iii, p. 246.

House of Commons. The resignation of a Minister may be due to a particular defeat in the House of Commons; but convention does not allow his successors to rest their title on the votes of the House. The people's opinion must be consulted at the earliest moment which is consistent with the disposal of outstanding business.

When it is said that the people choose between two alternative Ministries it must be understood to mean a choice between two Ministries to be nominated by the leaders of the parties concerned. It is primarily a choice between two leaders. Normally the leader of a party is, at the present day, placed in that position as a result of the vote of a party meeting. But, if the two-party system is to cease to be operative, the capacity of the people to make their choice will be considerably reduced, since in these circumstances they cannot indicate by their votes the class of members of which it is desired that the Ministry shall consist. And, as has already been mentioned, such a reduction in the capacity of the people would necessarily involve an enlargement in the capacity of the Sovereign.

This chapter, which is concerned with the dependence of Ministries upon the Sovereign, the representatives of the people, and the people themselves, is designed so as to demonstrate that, although the three kinds of control have followed one another in historical sequence, the phases overlap, and that, even at the present day, all three are to some extent effective. The King still retains power to select Prime Ministers when the normal system is dislocated. The House of Commons, although it has suffered during recent years a decline in its influence, may in the event of an increase in the number of parties regain the full degree of its negative control over Ministries. And the last of the controls, that of the people, depends so intimately on the present methods of voting and the present working of the party system that it may, perhaps, once again become subordinate to that of the King and the House of Commons. The people would then be left with the bare function of selecting representatives. But, if the King's power became enlarged, it would not presumably be exercised with the same detachment from the people's views as it was in the days of royal autocracy. It may be assumed that it would be exercised in a manner best calculated to interpret the wishes of the people.

CHAPTER VIII

THE BEGINNINGS OF THE MANDATE

§ 1. Royal influence over elections

THE influence of the Sovereign over the course of elections during parts of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was often active in individual constituencies. Majorities were secured for candidates whose attitude was ascertained to be loyal by means of promises of appointments and the use of patronage. And in a general way, too, the Sovereign frequently made it plain that he expected his subjects to give him their support in the choice of representatives. He did this by changing the composition of Ministries shortly before general elections, or by making express personal appeals in favour of particular courses of action. Support for the royal policy was invariably given. A failure to respond to the solicitation of the Sovereign was almost inconceivable.

Exercise of Crown influence obviously limited the possibility of free determination by the people in regard to matters of government. Although some faint notions of the ability of the electors to decide issues began to be current at the time of William III and Anne, the leading part still played by the Sovereign in politics was largely responsible for the delay in the development of democratic principles.

It is unnecessary for the present purpose to look back further than the period of the later Stuarts—prior, that is to say, to a time when a steady popular interest in politics is discernible—so as to remark on the extent to which local elections were interfered with on the Crown's behalf. In that period and in the reigns of the first three Georges this interference seems to have been habitual, except, perhaps, in the reign of William III.

Although much of the organization of placemen after the Restoration may well have been arranged without obstructing the free use of votes in constituencies, there is no doubt that Charles II occasionally endeavoured to secure the return of particular candidates who were favourable to his views. In 1679, for instance, Danby told the Duke of Newcastle that the King 'desires you will promote as much as you can the choice of good members in those places which are influenced by your Grace'.¹ James II was equally, if not more, active in this way. His Secretary of State (Sunderland) took steps, immediately after his accession, to see that 'persons of approved loyalty and affection to Government be chosen' at the elections in Leicestershire.² This instance is but typical. Similar precautions were taken in 1687.

It is probable that interference with local elections diminished during the reign of William III, in spite of the fact that the royal corruption of members of Parliament by baits of pensions and places continued. As a foreigner, he was unlikely to wish to concern himself with the details of electioneering. But in the following reign the management of constituencies was, it seems, extensive. Very soon after her accession and immediately before her first general election Queen Anne caused the powerful Duke of Newcastle to be informed that she 'relied entirely upon your good inclinations and intentions to promote her service as you might do upon her being ready and desirous to give you any mark of her favour that can be agreeable in your circumstances'.³ She certainly lost no time in establishing relations with a prominent election manager. There is some evidence that Crown influence was felt in the constituencies during the election of 1705.⁴

It would be particularly interesting to know to what extent the influence of the Court diminished the free expression of the people's votes in the election of 1710, since the change in the representation due to that election was considerable. On the one hand, Swift asserted that 'the Court was so far from interposing its credit, that there was no change in the Admiralty, not above one or two in the Lieutenancy, nor any other methods used to influence elections'.⁵ It is unlikely that this was his real opinion, since he was engaged in justifying the position of the Tories. He observed, in a private letter in 1711, that the Queen might obtain any kind of

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 13th Report, Appendix, Part II, MSS. of Duke of Portland, vol. ii, p. 153.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 12th Report, Appendix, Part V, p. 86. See E. Porritt, The Unreformed House of Commons, vol. i, pp. 395-420.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 13th Report, Appendix, Part II, MSS. of Duke of Portland, vol. ii, p. 183.

⁴ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part IV, MSS. of Duke of Portland, vol. iv, pp. 189-90, 30 May 1705. See also A Collection from Dyer's Letters concerning the Elections of the Present Parliament (1706), pp. 3, 10.

⁵ The Examiner, No. 25, 11-18 Jan. 1711. This assertion was repeated later by him in Memoirs relating to that change which happened in the Queen's Ministry of 1710 and in An Enquiry into the Behaviour of the Queen's Last Ministry.

majority she liked after a dissolution 'by managing elections'.¹ On the other hand, it is certain that several offers of the exercise of influence in constituencies were made to Harley shortly before the election, coupled with suggestions that the assistance so given should be rewarded by appointments under the Crown,² and that some Crown appointments were contemplated or made with the object of securing the return of members favourable to the Tories.³ Harley, it seems, had let it be known that he desired to have as many supporters in the ensuing Parliament as he could possibly procure;⁴ and this object was not to be attained by honest electioneering. A note, written by him during the period of the election, mentioned the desirability that the 'bcnt and disposition of the people should be guided and directed for the Queen's service and the public good, and not to be at the disposal of particular persons'. This could be done, he said, 'by steady management'; and he remarked on the effect of appointments which had been and might be made.⁵

The Whig politicians took advantage of the alien interests of the first two Georges to annex to the Ministry of the day much of the royal patronage. But George II struggled to retain control of the management of local elections. He was helped by the offers of local magnates to influence returns, so as to obtain support for the Ministers chosen by him.⁶

George III made a determined effort to maintain a pre-dominance of royal influence over elections. He lost no time in insisting on his rights. In the year following that of his accession he saw to it that the boroughs attached to the Duchy of Cornwall, which had been allowed to fall into the hands of the Ministry, were once more at the disposal of the Sovereign; but he was not able, it seems, upon this occasion

¹ Journal to Stella, 9 Dec. 1711.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part IV, MSS. of the Duke of Portland, vol. iv, pp. 561, 565, 570.

³ Ibid., pp. 576, 590, 608, 615. Hist. MSS. Comm., 11th Report, Appendix, Part V, MSS. of Earl of Dartmouth, vol. i, p. 297.

⁴ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part IV, MSS. of Duke of Portland, vol. iv, p. 598.

⁵ Hardwicke, Miscellaneous State Papers, vol. ii, pp. 485 ff. A list of appointments, made prior to the election, is given in a tract entitled The Right of the Sovereign in the Choice of his Servants (1714).

⁶ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 52. See also Hist. MSS. Comm., Report on MSS. of Mrs. Stopford-Sackville, vol. i, pp. 151-2. The results of the profound researches of Mr. L. B. Namier may be found in the first volume of his work on England in the Age of the American Revolution, pp. 123-24.

to regain the more general Crown influence which had been appropriated by the Duke of Newcastle.¹ Between his accession and the resignation of Lord North, in 1782, George III continued to be extremely active in mastering and practising the art of election management.² After that date, either his interest declined or his opportunities were limited.

The two sovereigns who succeeded George III lacked either the enthusiasm or the occasion to influence particular returns on the eighteenth-century scale. Elections came to be managed almost exclusively by the Treasury without any noticeable interference on behalf of the Crown. For some years of the reign of George III the Treasury had done a large amount of business in the buying of seats in Parliament; and there was considerable truth in the statement made by Creevy, in 1809, that 'it was perfectly well known that a dissolution of Parliament was not an appeal to the people, but to the Treasury'.³ The terms of a letter, written by Hawkesbury to the King in 1806, imply that the members attached to the Government of the day might still be instrumental in turning the balance.⁴ But a Statute which was passed in 1809 to prevent traffic in seats seems to have had some effect, for Lord Liverpool, as Prime Minister, stated confidentially, in 1812, that he had then only one Treasury seat in his disposal.⁵ After 1832 the influence of Government money ceased to be exercised in election contests; and the business of management of elections was thenceforward in the hands of party organizations.

Emphasis has been laid on the interference with the returns of members by the Crown as a factor in the prevention of unconstrained voting, not only because it has a bearing on the more general management of elections, which is mentioned in the following paragraphs, but because Crown influence at most times exceeded any other kind of political influence. It is obvious, however, that corruption or intimidation of voters limited the free expression of the people's opinions, whatever the source from which the interference came. The extent of election management undertaken by

¹ Dodgton's Diary, 2 Feb. 1761.

² See L. B. Namier, England in the Age of the American Revolution, vol. i, pp. 153-78.

³ 14 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 116. See also Hist. MSS. Comm., MSS of J. B. Fortescue Esq., vol. viii, pp. 394, 396, 397, 398, 414.

⁴ C. D. Yonge, Life of the Earl of Liverpool, vol. i, p. 219.

⁵ Ibid., p. 444.

different groups of Whigs during the eighteenth century is still the subject of investigation; but the buying of seats by the Pelhams alone must have been sufficient virtually to disenfranchise thousands of electors among a confined electorate.

The peculiar circumstances surrounding most of the general elections of the reigns of William III and Anne make it difficult to determine the extent to which the votes of the electors affected the policy of government. The fact that the sympathies, and even the wishes, of the Sovereign were generally made plain prior to general elections greatly diminished the value of the results of the returns as indications of the views of the people. If, as happened on several occasions, the Sovereign reconstituted the Ministry shortly before the election of a new Parliament, it was certain that there would be a majority for the favoured party. Not only was there an overwhelming tradition for support of the Ministers of the Crown, but many influential persons in the constituencies were either induced or were anxious to ensure that candidates approved by the Sovereign should be elected.

It seems, however, that the results of general elections were usually consonant with the attitude of public opinion, and that the Sovereign was conscious of the desirability of maintaining agreement between his policy and the views of his subjects. Public opinion occasionally influenced the choice of Ministers. But it cannot be said that the return of a majority for one party rather than the other cast an obligation on the Sovereign or the Ministry to pursue a particular course of action.

The ability of William III to secure Parliaments which were either in agreement with his apparent predilections or favourable to his purposes was illustrated in the 'jingo' election of 1695, and also in the two elections of 1701. After the Whig element in the Ministry had been steadily strengthened, the return of a Whig majority in 1695 enabled the King vigorously to pursue his war policy. During 1700 he found himself impressed with the necessity of including in his Ministry some Tory politicians; and he accordingly gave offices to Godolphin and Rochester. Public opinion seemed to call for such a step; and 'to sweeten the humours and measures of the new Parliament the King was willing to oblige these men who were . . . distinguished by the name of the Church Party [i.e. Tories], who had thought themselves neglected'.¹ This change having been effected, the question of the succession to the throne and the conditions of foreign policy led the King to dissolve Parliament. He expressed the need of having 'the more immediate sense of the Kingdom in so great a conjecture'.² The strengthening of the Tory position in the Ministry was followed by the return of a Tory majority in the House of Commons.

But in the autumn of 1701, when the people had changed their outlook and were in agitation against the Tory attitude towards France, Somers, one of the most sagacious and disinterested of statesmen among the Whigs, was anxious that the King should place himself in a strong position to carry out his war policy. For this purpose Somers regarded dissolution as requisite. He accordingly proposed to the King that he should either change his Ministers or else display an intention to do so. He assured him that success was certain.

'No hazard,' he said, 'for let the majority fall as it will, the present temper will force them to do what the King will desire. But the majority will be sure, if it be considered upon what foot it was understood the last Parliament was chosen; and yet how small a majority and how obtained. . . . But, to set himself and his people at ease, he must trust those whom the body of the people do not distrust.'³

Somers evidently thought that, if the publicly acknowledged views of the Sovereign were shown to be in accord with the trend of opinion in the country, the usual tendency for a proportion of members of Parliament to support the Ministry of the day would be increased. Such was the disposition of parties in relation to political differences, that he expected a majority in a new Parliament to be in favour of the King's policy, even though a large number of old members was returned. This advice proved to be reliable.

The Proclamation issued at the dissolution of Parliament in November 1701 disclosed a novel attitude towards the electors by suggesting that they should choose their representatives with a view to a particular policy being supported. No previous communication of the kind had admitted so intimate a connexion between the people and the course of policy. The terms of the Proclamation are worth quoting at some length. It ran thus:

¹ White Kennett, History of England, vol. iii, p. 793. ² 5 Parl. Hist., 1233.

³ Hardwicke, Miscellaneous State Papers, vol. ii, pp. 453-5.

'Whereas Our loving subjects have universally by their loyall addresses, expressed their resentment of the injustice and indignity offered to us and our People, by the late proceedings of the French King, in taking upon him to own and declare the pretended Prince of Wales to be King of England, Scotland and Ireland; and have thereby also in the most dutiful manner, expressed their affection to our Person and Government, and their steady resolution at this time to do all things which can be desired from good Englishmen and Protestants, We have received the same with great satisfaction and have thought it reasonable in this extraordinary juncture to give Our subjects the opportunity of choosing such persons to represent them in Parliament as they may judge most likely to bring to effect their just and pious purposes and in order thereto to dissolve this present Parliament. . . .'¹

It was observed, at the time the Proclamation was issued, that its phraseology implied a new distribution of political power. Defoe hailed it as 'a glorious recognition' and 'an unexampled testimony of the just rights of the People'.² An opponent, who expressed his apprehension at the increase of the people's power, wrote that 'to appeal from their representatives to the multitude is setting the axe to the very root of the Constitution'.³ Defoe, however, insisted that the terms of the Proclamation provided proof that 'the people are in some measure judges of the actions and management of their representatives'.⁴

The royal invitation to the electors to choose representatives to carry out 'their just and pious purposes' can hardly have meant that the policy of government would be made dependent on the way in which the people cast their votes. And the fact that the source of the appeal was the King himself, and not merely a party leader, restricted the free choice of representatives. The incident was an isolated one; and it does not seem to have led to further developments.

Results of general elections in the reign of Queen Anne ¹ Public Record Office, Chancery Warrants, Series 2, File 2808; British Museum, 21 h. 3 (221).

² The Original Power of the Collective Body of the People of England, Examined and Asserted.

³ Charles Davenant, The Danger of Appealing to the People from their Representatives in Parliament (reprinted in Political and Commercial Works (1771 ed.), vol. iv, pp. 267 ff.).

⁴ Some Remarks on the First Chapter in Dr. Davenant's Essays.

always confirmed any plainly shown preferences of the Sovereign for the policy of one party rather than the other. It may be assumed that these preferences were not made apparent without some regard to the movements of public opinion. But their expression, prior to general elections, limited the significance of the people's part in the proceedings. The reconstitution of the Ministry shortly before the dissolution of Parliament may be described, in the words of Professor Trevelyan, as 'the cause, not the effect, of the electoral decision'.¹

Although the Queen made no direct appeal for the support of the Tories in the election of 1702, she made it sufficiently clear that her sympathies were with the Tory party to ensure that it obtained a majority. 'My own principles', she said in her Speech, 'must always keep me entirely firm to the interests and religion of the Church of England and will incline me to countenance those who have the truest zeal to support it.' The election of 1710 may be cited as the outstanding example of the Queen's choice of a time for change in the composition of her Ministry which corresponded with a change in the views of her subjects. It also well illustrates the meaningless character of an election which was immediately preceded by a decision by the Sovereign to undertake a fresh course of policy.

The reaction of public feeling against the Whigs in 1710, engendered by the Sacheverell trial and dissatisfaction with the continuance of the war, was sufficient to encourage the Queen to conform to it. 'Her Majesty,' Swift said, 'following her own inclinations and those of her people, resolved to make some changes in the Ministry and take Mr. Harley into her councils.' He described the new appointments which were made prior to the election as happily in consonance with public opinion rather than due to it; but he also remarked that 'it was the most prudent course imaginable to the Queen, to lay hold of the disposition of the people for changing the Parliament and Ministry'.²

If the constitutional standards of to-day were to be applied, any display of the personal predilections of the Sovereign in politics would be regarded as irregular. But, after making allowance for the position in which the Sovereign stood in the early eighteenth century, the undue use by George I of his influence, so as to secure support for the Whigs in general elections, appears to be unjustifiable. It is impossible to defend it on the ground that attention was being paid to the prevailing tendency of public opinion.

¹ England under the Stuarts, p. 485.

² An Enquiry into the Behaviour of the Queen's Last Ministry; The Examiner, Nos. 14 and 25.

Soon after the new King's arrival in England Lord Cowper wrote a paper for his information which was naïvely entitled An Impartial History of Parties. In this paper it was pointed out 'that the parties are so near an equality, and the generality of the world so much in love with the advantages a King of Great Britain has to bestow . . . , that 'tis wholly in Your Majesty's power, by showing your favour in due time (before the elections) to one or other of them, to give which of them you please a clear majority in all succeeding parliaments'.

George I adopted this advice whole-heartedly, and replaced the Tory Ministry with one consisting of Whigs. This action was taken prior to his first general election.

In the concluding paragraph of the Proclamation preceding this election, the King announced that he did not doubt that 'our loving subjects' would, in choosing their representatives, 'have a particular regard to such as shewed a firmness to the protestant succession when it was in danger'.¹ As Lecky observed: 'In the face of such a proclamation, emanating from the Sovereign himself, a Tory Parliament would have been a direct incentive to civil war.'² The result of the election was the return of a large Whig majority. The Proclamation was vigorously criticized by the Tories; and Sir William Wyndham was reprimanded by the Speaker for saying in the House of Commons that certain expressions in the Proclamation were not only unprecedented, but also of dangerous consequence to the very being of Parliament.³

The sole excuse for the undisguised attachment of George I to the Whigs in 1715 was the peculiar situation created by the change of dynasty. A repetition, therefore, of this display of personal preference in the election of 1722 was still less justifiable. An appeal of a markedly partisan character was then made by George I in the Speech announcing the dissolution of Parliament, in which it was stated that he was 'firmly determined to continue to countenance such as have manifested their zeal for the present establishment'.¹ There was again, of course, a large Whig majority as a result of the election. Sir J. Vanbrugh wrote to Lord Carlisle that 'my Lord Townshend and his near friends seem to think it chiefly owing to the firm declaration in the King's Speech who[m] he would trust and stand by'.²

¹ 7 Parl. Hist. 24.

² Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i. p. 211.

³ 7 Parl. Hist. 51.

In the circumstances which have been described in the foregoing paragraphs, the people had but little freedom or opportunity to make decisions on political issues. It must be admitted, however, that contemporary accounts of election contests, about the time of William III and Anne and even earlier, point to considerable popular interest in the public questions which were debated at election times. The variety and violence of party cries may be cited in support of this indication. How, then, it may be asked, could the interest have been so well sustained, if the actual influence of the electors was so slight?

It is true that some of the cries represented a keen desire on the part of the people for the execution of certain policies. The demand for 'no standing army', which became articulate immediately after the Restoration and was a prevalent election catch-phrase in the elections of 1681 and 1698, and the cries of 'exclusion' in 1681 and 'no Dutchmen' in 1698, which were to some extent spontaneous, are instances of this. But such cries as were not the result of party intrigue were merely an outlet for pent-up feelings; and it was not seriously expected that the elections would bring about the results for which clamour was raised. A people whose political existence was just beginning to be recognized was very naturally ready to avail itself of the opportunities of general elections to ventilate repugnance for opponents and to indulge in the pleasures of obloquy. Calling adversaries 'Tackers' and 'Sneakers' was a new game which appealed to the simple intelligences of the time. The very word 'excise' aroused a blind antagonism throughout a large part of the eighteenth century. Chesterfield said that it would have to 'change its name by Act of Parliament before it will go down with the people, who know names better than things'.³ And the history of the use of the slogan, 'the Church in danger', during the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries, would provide an interesting exposition of the methods of fomenting the prejudices of the people for party ends.

¹ 7 Parl. Hist. 982.

² Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 37.

³ Lord Chesterfield's Letters (1845 edition), vol. iv, p. 461.

§ 2. Early mentions of elections in connexion with policy

Although there may not have been any real capacity in the people to determine issues by voting at elections in the reigns of William III and Anne, many of the political broadsheets and tracts of the later part of the seventeenth and earlier part of the eighteenth century provide evidence that the notion of such a capacity was beginning to be propagated. From about 1680 onwards scarcely a general election took place without the country being flooded with tracts or sheets entitled 'Cautions to Electors', 'Advice to Freeholders', or 'An Address to the People of England', in which disquisitions on the personal qualifications of candidates developed into discussions of matters of policy. They appeared occasionally before the Restoration.

At first the choice of members by the electors was frequently described as a likely reflection of the views and characteristics of the nation at large, either from an international or from a domestic point of view. As early as the reign of Charles I, George Wither, the poet and pamphleteer, wrote in an election tract:

'I will offer to your consideration that which I conceive to be the best measures . . . for replenishing the House of Commons with such members as shall be likely . . . to become instruments of removing our present mischief, and by establishing a happy peace among us for the future; if we be not grown so corrupt a body that we will not be represented by good and discreet men; which it seems . . . made us choose a representative body in corruptions and failings, like unto ourselves.

The butterflies produce not bees;

Good-fruits grow not on evill-trees.

. . . And what good can be had, or what benefit can be looked for from such a choice? Or what better choice can be made unless you seriously, prudently and conscionably manage your elections?

When wolves are by the flock for guardians chose,
Who marvailles, if their skins and lives they lose.'¹

It was said in 1681, to take a later example, that 'they whom you chuse will represent your qualities, as well as

¹ Letters of Advice touching the choice of Knights and Burgesses for the Parliament (1646).

your persons: and if you send us up a false glass, it will represent you with an ugly face. . . . You have formerly had the character of a sober temperate nation; but, if you chuse drunkards to represent you, they will conclude that you are all drunk'.¹

A similar strain of argument is found again during the election of 1702:

'What do you think our Allies thought of our Parliament, when instead of raising money to carry on a vigorous war against France, they clog'd the funds with idle pretences of religion? Bad enough to be sure. But what do you imagine they thought of us that chose 'em? Much worse without doubt. They could do no other than believe 'em to be the true representative of the English nation, for the thing representing ought to resemble the thing it represents both in its nature and qualifications, and so foreigners could conclude no other, than a mad people chose a mad Parliament.'²

Occasionally anti-papist tracts of as early date as 1679-81 made some suggestion that the right choice of Parliament-men would result in the adoption of policies salutary to the nation. In a tract of better quality than many of its period it was asserted that 'a good Parliament' (a wisely chosen Parliament, that is to say) might, among other advantageous steps, 'advise his Majesty to such things as shall fortify the Protestant interest and terrify the French tyrant into a greater moderation towards the disconsolate Hugonots'.³

Sometimes political periodicals or pamphlets described general elections as displaying the 'sense' or the 'disposition' of the nation, without positively suggesting that there was an obligation on Parliament to give effect to any particular policy. For instance: 'The general choice of the same members in the last Parliament, that had served in the two former, sufficiently shews the sense of the nation.'⁴ Or:

'If elections of members to serve in Parliament be the best standard to judge the disposition of the Kingdom by, it is not so long since we had an opportunity of feeling the pulse of the nation; but that we may reasonably conclude that, all other things remaining as they did, the temper and complexion of the generality of the people is also much the same.'⁵

¹ The Certain Way to save England, &c. (1681).

² The Observer, vol. iii, No. 100.

³ An Address to the Honourable City of London and all other Cities, Shires and Corporations, concerning their choice of a new Parliament (1681). Cf. England's Great Interest in the Choice of this new Parliament (1679).

⁴ The Impartial Protestant Mercury, 12 May 1681.

⁵ An Impartial Account of the Nature and Tendency of the late Addresses, &c. (1681).

Or: 'Your choice now will be the best standard by which to judge the present disposition of the Kingdom.'¹

The stage was past in which merely the personal characteristics most suitable to candidates were discussed by pamphleteers. The policies which would be undertaken were defined.² But there was, so far, little suggestion that the decision in regard to those policies rested with the electors.

Matters were carried a stage farther when policies were described as possible or impossible according to the way in which a general election went. For example:

'If the Parliament, which will now be chosen [November, 1701], should consist of the same persons, or of men of the same temper with the former Parliament, it will be impossible to perfect or support that alliance which is forming for the security of England and Europe against the power of France.'³

Or:

'Wherefore, it greatly behoves all electors at the next choice, to take especial care that they do not put any, who did not appear for that Bill [the Occasional Conformity Bill], into a capacity to bring the like mischief upon this nation hereafter.'⁴

A famous Tory election tract, entitled English Advice to the Freeholders of England, written by Bishop Atterbury and issued at the time of the election following the death of Queen Anne, concluded with lists of 'merits' or alternative policies in parallel columns. On the one hand, for instance, there was: 'No new war, no new taxes'; and, on the other: 'A new war, six shillings in the pound, a general excise and a poll-tax.' At the foot were the words: 'Choose which you please.' The Whigs countered by producing a tract in similar form. Among the alternatives were: 'King George and the illustrious House of Hanover' and 'The Pretender, Mass and wooden shoes.'⁵

The preceding examples of the unofficial portrayal of the people in a responsible guise are, with the exception of the last mentioned, taken from the period of the later Stuarts. Yet further progress, in the reigns of George I and George II, is apparent in the attempt to make specific legislative pro-

¹ The Best Choice of Parliament Men, &c. (1701).

² A particularly graphic example of this stage is to be found in the Harley Papers (Hist. MSS. Comm. (Portland MSS.)), vol. viii, p. 54.

³ A Letter sent to a Gentleman, &c. (1701).

⁴ Advice to all Freeholders and other Electors for the ensuing Parliament. See also Advice to the Electors of Great Britain, occasioned by the Intended Invasion from France (1708).

⁵ Somers' Tracts, 3rd Collection, vol. iv, pp. 353, 379.

posals issues in elections, after the manner in which they are made at the present day. The Freeholder's Journal and The Weekly Journal or Saturday's Post tried to make the Septennial Act an issue in the election of 1722. Again, in 1734 *The Craftsman*¹ argued that the result of the election proved a general opposition to the Excise Scheme, while the periodicals supported by the Ministry challenged this inference.

Agitation for the passing of a Bill to reduce the number of placemen in Parliament in 1739 and 1740 encouraged the Opposition to claim for the people power to prove their insistence on this legislation by means of the exercise of the franchise. Pulteney, in his Address to the Electors . . . Occasioned by the late Secession, pointed out that, by pledging or instructing candidates on the subject of a Place Bill, 'it will be possible, if it should appear to be your general sentiments, to compose a majority of the next Parliament of such gentlemen as are honest enough not only to acknowledge the necessity of this law, but also to exert their utmost endeavours actually to obtain it'. Another tract told the electors that 'you will shortly . . . have it in your power to make the most effectual law against filling the House of Commons with place-men, by making independence in your candidates the rule of your choice'.²

These instances form a link with the subject-matter of Chapter II of this book, which deals with the influence of constituents on members. The development of the power of the people as a whole cannot be fully appreciated without regarding its preparatory local development in separate constituencies. It was a simple extension of ideas for constituents, who had obtained a measure of control over their particular representatives, to conclude that a wider control would be exercised over Parliament in general, provided that the interests of the majority of the electors in the whole country were focused on the same point.

During the reign of George II, not only were politicians talking of the capacity of the people to decide issues, but there were some signs of official admissions of this capacity. It has been seen that the terms of the Proclamation announcing the dissolution of Parliament in the autumn of 1701 suggested that the people's choice of their representatives might affect the course of politics; but in 1735 the Speech delivered before the Session contained statements which implied some recognition of the determinant capacity of the people to be exercised through the process of voting.

¹ 25 May 1734.

² A Serious Exhortation (1740).

'The sense of the nation', the Speech ran, 'is best learned by the choice of their representatives; and I am persuaded that the behaviour and conduct of my faithful Commons will demonstrate to all the world the unshaken fidelity and attachment of my good subjects to my person and government.'

It was beginning to be seen that it was worth the while of those in authority to credit the electors with enlarged political powers, even though there was no intention that those powers should be admitted in practice.¹

§ 3. The attitude of the people in the eighteenth century

Not only during the period of the later Stuarts, but during a large part of the eighteenth century, such election addresses as were issued by candidates seldom contained any reference to current politics. They were confined, as a rule, after requests for votes and 'interest', to assurances of the good intention of the candidates towards advancement of the concerns of the country in general and of the constituency in particular. They contained such vague expressions as 'the preservation of our glorious Constitution', 'the rights and liberties of the people', 'the steady pursuit of the public good', or 'concurrence in every measure which shall be deemed necessary for vindicating the rights and honour of this nation'.² On rare occasions only was there included a pledge to support the introduction or the repeal of legislation. A candidate for one of the apple-growing constituencies, for instance, told his electors, in 1763, that he would contribute, as much as was in his power, to the repeal of the tax lately imposed on makers of cider.³ But this particular pledge can be explained by the strong resentment which was aroused in the areas affected by the imposition of the tax.

The terms of the addresses of the rival candidates at the election for the County of Norfolk in the important election of 1784 illustrate respectively the old style and that which was to become prevalent at a later period. The Whig candidates issued a joint letter simply stating that, in the event of their election, it would be their 'mutual determination to discharge the important trust reposed in us with fidelity and independence; and to support to the best of our judgment the interests of this country and the principles of our glorious constitution, as established at the Revolution'. On the other hand, the Tory candidate wrote: 'I stand forth to give the County of Norfolk an opportunity of . . . sending to Parliament two members who agree in condemning the violent and arbitrary resolutions of the last House of Commons.'¹

¹ See § 5 of this Chapter.

² Cf. an address drafted by Dr. Johnson in 1780, Boswell, Life of Johnson (Everyman ed.), vol. ii, p. 313.

³ St. James Chronicle, 1 Nov. 1763.

Apart from a few special instances of popular issues which aroused excitement among the masses, some of them fomented by political agents, there was an almost continuous condition of lethargy and lack of interest during the reigns of the first three Georges. Several causes contributed to this situation. At one stage the overwhelming predominance of the Whigs, at another the absence of any difference in party principles, and, all the time, the flagrant inequity of the state of representation and, still more, the scandal of placemen and corruption, sometimes exaggerated, but sufficient to discourage the most optimistic—all these tended to render the average citizen indifferent or disgusted. Even in what appear to have been critical times, the amount of concern in elections was meagre; and the number of contests never reached more than a small proportion of the possible number. Although the rowdyism usual in constituencies with the wider franchise gave an impression of political excitement and enthusiasm, 'interest' in the sinister sense excluded interest in the more reputable meaning of that term.

Contemporary comments on the apathy of the public can be found at stages when the country's destiny might well have aroused general anxiety. It was complained by a promoter of a political periodical in 1753 that 'of the various points which have been agitated for some years passed, only the French players and the Jews Act had made any manifest impression on the minds of the people'.² And in 1764 Charles Townshend wrote of the subdued state of the national temper and the habitual and general indifference and distrust.³ There were, it is true, a few years of widespread agitation in the metropolis regarding Wilkes and the Middlesex election (1768-71); and, a few years later, the subject of the independence of the American colonies aroused strong feelings among limited sections of the public. But in 1774, a year of great consequence for the nation, Burke wrote to Rockingham: 'Your Lordship remarks very rightly on the supineness of the public. Any remarkable high-way robbery at Hounslow-heath would make more conversation than all the disturbances in America.' Again, in 1775 Burke wrote:

¹ Journal of the Proceedings of the Election of Two Knights of the Shire to represent the County of Norfolk in Parliament (1784), pp. 24-8. See also Election Magazine (Norfolk) (1784), pp. 13, 39.

² The Protester, Nov. 1753.

³ Hist. MSS. Comm., 11th Report, Appendix, Part IV, MSS. of Marquis of Townshend, p. 126.

'I am satisfied that within a few years there has been a great change in national character. We seem no longer that eager, inquisitive, jealous, fiery people, which we have been formerly, and which we have been a very short time ago. . . . No man commends the measures which have been pursued or expects any good from those which are in preparation; but it is a cold languid opinion, like what men discover in affairs that do not concern them.'¹

The only doubt which this account suggests is that Burke made too great a contrast between 1775 and the period a few years earlier. The despondency among the people seems to have recurred over a course of years; and, as each tentative movement towards reform proved to be abortive, this despondency became accentuated. Fox wrote to Grey in 1801 that, until he saw that the public had some dislike, letting indignation alone, to absolute power, he saw no use in stating in the House of Commons the principles of liberty and justice.²

The inability of Parliament itself to take any effective share in many aspects of government during the eighteenth century may provide some explanation of the persistent apathy. Not only during the earlier part of the century, but even during the later part, there was a frequent absence of any real or large issues before Parliament. Dr. Johnson maintained in 1777 that, with the exception of America, 'there was hardly ever any question of great importance before Parliament, any question in which a man might not well vote upon one side or the other'.³

There were, however, three occasions in the eighteenth century (1701, 1710, and 1768-71) when sections of the people not only exhibited a marked desire that the evils of ineffective or perverse government should be set right, but also took particularly drastic steps towards effecting the change in policy which they regarded as requisite. Petitions for the dissolution of Parliament were organized, so that the people might display by their votes their disapproval of the conduct of the Ministry of the day.

¹ Burke's Correspondence, vol. i, p. 453; vol. ii, p. 48.

² Memoirs and Correspondence of C. J. Fox (ed. Russell), vol. iii, p. 340.

³ Boswell, Life of Johnson (Everyman ed.), vol. ii, p. 140.

In the earlier instances of 1701 and 1710 the petitions seem to have been used by the party to which the Sovereign was about to give a large measure of favour as a device to attest the support of public opinion; and, for this reason, the dissolution of Parliament swiftly followed after the petitions. In the middle of 1701, while the anti-popery and anti-French feeling ran very high, many petitions were presented to the King praying him to dissolve Parliament. Again, in 1710, the reaction against the Whigs which followed on the Sacheverell trial led the Tories to organize similar petitions, which alleged that Parliament no longer represented the sentiments of the people. The protests which were raised against the constitutional impropriety of this kind of petition naturally came, in 1701 and 1710, from the party which was not in possession of the favour of the Sovereign.¹ It is not surprising to find that, after the petitions of 1701 had been followed by a general election which produced a majority for an anti-French policy, the House of Commons passed a resolution to the effect that it was the right of the people to petition for the calling, sitting, or dissolving of Parliaments, as well as for the redressing of grievances.²

It was under different circumstances that, during the years 1768 to 1771, the agitation respecting Wilkes and the Middlesex election led, among other methods of demonstration, to petitions from several counties, as well as cities and boroughs, begging for the dissolution of Parliament. The County of Somerset, for instance, prayed the King to remove his Ministers and to dissolve 'that Parliament, in which your people can no longer place a confidence'.³ The petition of the City of Westminster was described by Horace Walpole as 'a step not only absurd, but of most dangerous precedent'.⁴ He considered it ridiculous that it should be thought likely that the King, who had an obsequious House of Commons,

¹ It is not at all certain that the Sovereign approved this method of expression of popular protest: cf. White Kennett, History of England, vol. iii, p. 828, where quotations are given from petitions for dissolution in 1701.

² Journals of the House of Commons, 26 Feb. 1702, vol. xiii, p. 767.

³ Lloyd's Evening Post, November and December, 1769.

⁴ Memoirs of George III, vol. iii, pp. 381-2.

should expose himself to the risks of an unnecessary general election. It was true enough that Ministers would, from a self-interested point of view, have committed an act of amazing folly in taking the risks that a general election would have involved in the enraged state of large numbers of the public. It was useless for petitioners to maintain, as did the Yorkshire petitioners, that they sought 'an opportunity of demonstrating their zeal for the Constitution by a choice of men who will guard the honour of the Crown and support the rights of the people'.¹ Similarly, it was ingenuous of the City of London, whose petition had been ungraciously answered, to send a formal remonstrance to the King in which the remonstrants assured themselves that the King would 'restore the constitutional government and quiet of your people by dissolving this Parliament and removing those evil Ministers for ever from your councils'. It is no wonder that the King returned an answer in which he referred to the remonstrance as 'disrespectful to me, injurious in my Parliament, and irreconcilable to the principles of the Constitution'.² In contrast to the outcome of the petitions of 1701 and 1710, no dissolution followed the petitions of 1769, since their organizers were acting in opposition to a Ministry chosen and approved by the King; a Ministry, that is to say, which the King had every intention of maintaining.

Few Ministers in 1769, however, deemed it politic to deny the right of citizens to present petitions for dissolution. Lord North is reported as having characterized them as unconstitutional; but, on being reminded of the very general scope of the right to petition, he qualified his remarks.³ Lord Egmont was bold enough to declare in the House of Lords that these petitions were 'highly censurable and treasonable'.⁴

The critical situation in which the country was placed in the years around 1770 led Lord Chatham to make two motions in the House of Lords for a humble address to his Majesty to dissolve Parliament. This expedient was doubtless suggested to his mind by the petitions which had been reaching the King from many constituencies. Both the motions were negatived; but their terms are suggestive of a

¹ 39 Gentleman's Magazine, 1769, p. 526. This petition was said to have been drafted by Wedderburn, who in his early days supported Wilkes. See Grenville Papers, vol. iv, p. 442 n.

² Cavendish Debates, vol. i, 15 Mar. 1770; 16 Parl. Hist. 894.

³ 16 Parl. Hist. 578; Lecky, History of England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. iii, p. 346.

⁴ Chatham Correspondence, vol. iii, p. 419.

greater power in the people than was currently acknowledged, and they mark an interesting stage in the development of the notion of drawing inferences from the results of general elections.

On the first occasion Lord Chatham proposed that His Majesty should 'take the recent and genuine sense of his people, by dissolving this present Parliament and calling, with all convenient despatch, a new Parliament'. A proposal of this kind, though not novel, was significant, coming as it did from the most notable statesman of the day. On the second occasion he used similar language, including the expression 'recur to the recent sense of his people'. Its use provides an interesting link between the elder and the younger Pitt. The latter aroused some comment in 1784, when he advised the employment of almost the same words in the Speech from the Throne prior to the dissolution of Parliament in that year.

At the times when petitions for the dissolution of Parliament were prevalent public petitions in general were numerous. But there is an important distinction between the particular class of petition which has just been discussed and petitions of other kinds. Petitions for dissolution did not merely, like other petitions, pray that a certain policy should or should not be carried out; but they prayed, in effect, that the petitioners might, with the rest of the electorate, demonstrate that a particular course should be adopted as a result of the balance of voting. It is this distinction, doubtless, which provided the chief argument for those who contended that these petitions were unconstitutional; and it is the suggestion of a determinant element which makes them of particular interest in tracing the history of the development of the principle of the mandate.

§ 4. *Defective representation*¹

As early as the reign of Charles II the reproach of the inadequate representation of the people in Parliament was the subject of comment among the more discerning. The Earl of Shaftesbury described the position as notorious, since boroughs with a handful of voters sent two representatives to Parliament, while boroughs of considerable size were unrepresented. It soon came to be understood that the real attitude of the electorate could only be ascertained from the composition of the House of Commons (if, indeed, it could be ascertained at all) by excluding from consideration all the nominated members or by paying attention only to the character of the returns for popular constituencies. It became customary thus to scrutinize and analyse election results so as to raise inferences regarding the 'sense of the people'.

¹ It is unnecessary to trace the history of the representation in this place, because, among other reasons, that work has been adequately done in books devoted to the subject.

This practice was occasionally adopted only a few years after the defects in representation began to be generally recognized. The results of the elections of members for the City of London, of Westminster, and the County of Middlesex were regarded as providing a significant clue to the attitude of the whole of the inhabitants of the country, since these constituencies were situated at the centre of the political life of the Kingdom and enjoyed a wide franchise. In the City of London and the City of Westminster, every male inhabitant householder had a right to vote; and in the County of Middlesex, as in the counties generally, the suffragc was in the forty-shilling freeholders.

County elections generally were cited, from the early eighteenth century, as providing a fair criterion of the true views of the whole body of persons with similar qualifications to the county voters. It was obvious that 'the sense of the people' could not be collected from the results of the elections as a whole, including those of the 'pocket' boroughs; but an analysis of the votes of the county freeholders or of the numbers of members returned by counties was a useful guide for the assessment of the situation. By virtue of a law of 1430, any one who owned freeholds to the value of forty shillings could vote at a county election. This was not, according to modern standards, a very wide franchise, since only a small proportion of the inhabitants were owners of land; but it was wide according to standards of the eighteenth century; and it must be remembered that, as the value of money altered, the county franchise became automatically enlarged.

Swift, writing in The Examiner in 1711, remarked that 'the truest way of judging the dispositions of the people in the choice of their representatives is by computing the county elections'.¹ And there was, at the conclusion of the election of 1734, a spirited controversy between The Craftsman (the famous Opposition periodical) and The Free Briton (the Walpole periodical) with regard to the efficacy of the county election results as a standard by which to judge 'the sense of the people'. The Craftsman denied that the borough elections provided any indication of the view taken by the people on the state of politics. The writer alleged that, if the Ministerial supporters, 'who boast so much of their success, will be pleased to look over the list of the knights of the shire, I believe that they will find at least three to one chosen against them'.¹ The Free Briton was forced merely to insist 'that the sense of the people hath declared itself on the side of the present establishment is clear from the majority of the new Parliament'.²

¹ The Examiner, No. 25, 11-18 Jan. 1711.

From time to time, as the century advanced, similar arguments were raised. In 1741, for instance, The Craftsman again adopted the device of excluding the borough election results and on this occasion analysed the county returns.³

'The majority of these [county] elections', it was said, 'will run in favour of the country interest, as they did at the last general election. This is the only criterion by which we can form any true judgment of the natural undistinguished sense of the people; for they [the county voters] are so numerous and most of them so honest and wealthy, that they are generally above the reach of corruption. But, on the other hand, nothing can be more impertinent and ridiculous than to collect the general sense of the people from the infamous elections and returns of those little, beggarly, corrupt boroughs, which Bishop Burnet too justly calls the rotten part of our Constitution and are chiefly inhabited by a parcel of loose, idle fellows, who neglect their families and prefer poaching, pilfering and sheep-stealing or any other vagabond course of life to the comfortable maintenance of honest labour and industry.'

These methods of surmounting the defects of an ineffective system of representation continued to be utilized down to the time of the Reform Bill of 1832. They were even adopted by Peel in 1829, who was hard put to it to justify his change of front respecting the relief of Roman Catholic disabilities, when, in one of the most canvassed incidents of his career, he made the sudden decision to propose relief legislation after having declared himself a determined opponent of any such concession.

¹ The Craftsman, 25 May 1734.

² The Free Briton, 20 June 1734.

³ The Craftsman, 23 May and 5 Aug. 1741.

In making his speech in the House of Commons proposing this enactment, Peel thought it desirable to establish that there was no popular opposition displayed at the preceding election of 1826. He pointed out that the fifteen largest counties and the twenty most populous towns returned members who were in favour of relief legislation. 'This', he said, 'is a practical and constitutional method of determining the sense of the people.'¹ It was, indeed, a curious argument to be used by one who was shortly to prove an inveterate opponent of any large measure of reform.

Peel had an unlucky way of involving himself in the creation of precedents of a democratic tendency and of later finding reason to regret his precipitancy in so doing. Another instance of this feature in his career will be mentioned shortly. He certainly lived to regret having contended that the wishes of the people could not only satisfactorily but properly be ascertained by an analysis of the votes of members for popular constituencies. Two years later, during the Reform Bill debates of 1831, Lord John Russell, in remarking how fond Peel was of quoting the earlier speeches of his opponents, proceeded to quote the ill-considered arguments of Peel in 1829, and added that he proposed to adopt the same course in reference to Reform, namely to analyse the county results in the preceding election. He took the members for seventeen counties, who voted on the Reform Bill at its second reading, and found that there were twenty-seven of those members in favour of the Bill and only nine against it.² Later in the year Earl Grey treated Peel in the same unsparing manner, quoting the passage which had been used by Lord John Russell. It would have been legitimate to have asked Peel why, if he was satisfied with the state of the representation, he found it necessary to adopt an analysis of votes of members of popular constituencies only.³

No doubt any method which provided a reasonable opportunity of estimating the real judgement of the people was better than none; but the value of the examination of the results of county elections and the votes of county members prior to 1832 must not be exaggerated. In the first place, the proportion of contested to uncontested county elections was always small—less than half. Sometimes there were fewer contests than ten. In the second place, the county

¹ 20 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 737.

² 7 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 959-69.

³ 3 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1511.

franchise was not always exercised freely and without corruption. The influence of the aristocratic families was very powerful in some counties: several counties were for long periods the preserves of Whigs or Tories; or the membership was even shared between them by arrangement.

There was a comforting, but dangerous theory, deserving of passing notice, which possibly eased the consciences of some few in the pre-Reform days who were afraid of Reform, namely the theory of virtual representation. Mansfield asserted in 1766, in opposition to the repeal of the Stamp Act, that the American Colonists were 'virtually represented'. At the time when the discussion of the legality of the taxation of the American colonies was at its height, Burke regarded it as absurd to suppose that a kind of representation, which had proved insufficient for Wales and the Palatine counties, could be satisfactory for a far greater and far more distant part of our territories.¹ But some years later, in A Letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe (1792), he discussed virtual representation in what seem to be very unconvincing terms. At that time he regarded virtual representation as possibly superior to actual representation, though he admitted that virtual representation could not exist independently of actual representation. The general inference to be drawn from his elaborate disquisition is that he was searching for a justification of inaction in the matter of Parliamentary Reform.

Pitt adopted the same theory in 1783, when, in speaking on a motion for reform in the representation, he wished to find a basis for discountenancing any proposal for a wide extension of the franchise. Members of Parliament, he said, genuinely represented the people at large and not merely those who had elected them.² This view was freely adopted shortly before and during the debates on the Reform Bill of 1832. Peel, in opposing the principle of universal suffrage, asserted that there existed a 'general representation' of the people in the House of Commons.³ But Sir James Scarlett (afterwards Lord Abinger), although he had started his career as a Whig and mild reformer, seems to have surpassed all others in a perverse interpretation of the theory of virtual representation. In 1831 he told the House of Commons that he considered reform unnecessary, since public opinion found its way sufficiently into the House, 'first, by means of the number of members returned for popular places; and, secondly, from the very fact of the great numbers of the House'.¹

¹ Cobban, Edmund Burke, p. 62.

² 23 Parl. Hist. 831. W. Paley in his Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785), Book VI, chapter vii, maintained that, 'by annexing the right of voting for members of the house of commons to different qualifications in different places, each order and profession of men in the community become virtually represented'. This was in the true Whig tradition.

³ 24 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1243.

The futility of arguing that the virtual representation of persons for whom rights were claimed provided an adequate excuse for opposing the reform of the franchise and of the distribution of seats was exposed by Macaulay in an indisputable manner.

'A virtual representative', he said, 'is, I presume, a man who acts as a direct representative would act: for surely it would be absurd to say that a man virtually represents the people of Manchester, who is in the habit of saying No, when a man directly representing the people of Manchester would say Ay. The utmost that can be expected from virtual representation is that it may be as good as direct representation. If so, why not grant direct representation to places which, as everybody allows, ought, by some process or other, to be represented.'²

§ 5. Alleged submissions to the people

Although it is unlikely that any one will be misled into concluding that at any time during the eighteenth century the people were in a position to exercise effective political power, other than of a most crude and indefinite character, it is possible to find occasions in which it suited politicians, as a matter of prudence, to act as if the sense of the people were systematically followed. They sought the moral support of the electorate in situations which demanded every reinforcement that could be made available. The few occasions on which the people were mentioned by those in authority as possessing an influence on the government of the country were those of emergency, when the usual disrespect for popular opinions dissolved before the tide of popular frenzy. This attention to the people's voice had sometimes at its back the fear of their ultimate physical preponderance, which is recognizable from time to time during the century.

¹ 7 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 158.

² 2 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1107.

It is, of course, a truism that politicians pay compliments to electors at election time and attribute to them many virtues and capacities which, when the election is over, are rapidly forgotten. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the circumstances of any allegation respecting the extent of the people's powers which is made at election time, with the object of ascertaining the motive behind it. But, whatever the circumstances, it is difficult to believe that a Minister of the eighteenth century would have troubled himself to look for any expression of the inclination of the people that might be disclosed through the voting at a general election and to adjust his policy accordingly.

In 1774, when the seriousness of the situation regarding the American colonies was growing extreme, Lord North wrote to the King, informing him that he advised the dissolution of Parliament 'lest popular dissatisfaction, arising from untoward events, should break the chain of those public measures necessary to reduce the colonies to obedience'.¹ It does not seem necessary to infer from these words that Lord North was prepared to follow the dictates of the electorate. Presumably he merely thought that the result of the election, which was almost a foregone conclusion, might enable him to point to a fresh Ministerial majority so as to strengthen his position abroad. The circumstances of the election of 1784, shortly to be mentioned, also illustrate a superficial recognition of the people's political capacity. Again, it is very probable that Grenville dissolved Parliament in 1806 as a matter of party convenience and expediency; but, upon the opening of the new session, he defended himself against criticisms regarding the sudden dissolution by ascribing his action to solicitude for a pronouncement by the people on the question of the prosecution of the war.

He said that 'it was surely a wise measure in His Majesty to appeal to the sense of his people, to refer to them the conduct of his servants, and thereby to call upon them to pronounce, in the eyes of the world, their sense as to the further prosecution of the contest'.² Considerable justification was required, at the time of this dissolution, for ending the period of Parliament before six or seven years had run; and if, as may be assumed, the real object of the dissolution was no more than an attempt to secure a larger majority, some laudable intention had to be expressed so as to avoid the criticisms of the censorious.

¹ Correspondence between George III and Lord North, vol. i, p. 219. Cf. the attitude of Lord North in 1780, p. 195 below.

² 8 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 27.

Speeches by Pitt and Fox in the debate on Grey's motion for Reform in 1797 throw light on the conflicting opinions which were held regarding the value of inferences to be drawn from the results of general elections. Pitt, in attempting to justify the existing state of the representation, asserted that it could be shown from recent examples that there was a close connexion between the return of members and the sentiments of the people.¹ This was, perhaps, the inevitable attitude of a Minister in Pitt's position; but it must have been difficult for him to have convinced himself that 'circumstances attendant on general elections' could provide any useful guide to the pulse of the public.

Fox, however, breathing the unconstrained air of opposition, was able to expose the almost transparent speciousness of the arguments which implied that the votes of the people had any but the most remote influence on the course of public affairs.

'It is a notable argument,' he observed, 'that because we do not find, at the general election, very material changes in the representation, the sentiments of the people continue the same, in favour of war, and in favour of his Majesty's Ministers. The very ground of the present discussion gives the answer to this argument. Why do we agitate the question of parliamentary reform? Why, because a general election does not afford the people the means of expressing their voices; because this House is not a sufficient representative of the people. Gentlemen are fond of arguing in this circle. When we contend that Ministers have not the confidence of the people, they tell us that Parliament is the faithful representative of the sense of the country. When we assert that the representation is defective, and shew, from the petitions to the throne, that the House does not speak the voice of the people, they turn to the general election, and say that at this period they had an opportunity of choosing faithful organs of their opinion; because very little or no change has taken place in the representation, the sense of the people must be the same. Sir, it is in vain for gentlemen to shelter themselves by this mode of reasoning. We assert that, under the present form and practice of elections, we cannot expect to see any remarkable change produced by a general election. We must argue from experience. Let us look back to the period of the American War. It will not be denied by the right honourable gentleman that, towards the end of that war, it became extremely unpopular, and that the King's Ministers lost the confidence of the nation. In the year 1780 a dissolution took place, and then it was naturally imagined by superficial observers, who did not examine the real state of representation, that the people would have returned a Parliament that would have unequivocally spoken their sentiments on the occasion. What was the case? I am able to speak with considerable precision. . . . I can take upon me to say that the change was very small indeed: not more than three or four persons were added to the number of those who had from the beginning opposed the disastrous career of the Ministers in that war. I remember that, upon that occasion, Lord North made use of precisely the same argument as is now brought forward: 'What,' said he, "can you contend the war is unpopular, after the declaration in its favour that the people have made by their choice of representatives? The general election is proof that the war continues to be the war of the people of England."''¹

¹ 33 Parl. Hist. 677.

Perhaps the most ludicrous instance of the type of argument thus impugned by Fox is to be found in the debates leading up to the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, when it was suggested that, if, as was asserted by reformers, the sense of the people had been adequately shown in the preceding general election, the state of the representation must have been satisfactory as it stood.

The divergency between Pitt and Fox at the time of the debate which included the above-quoted speeches was not merely limited to facts, but was also concerned with principles. They took different views of the people's proper place in the Constitution. Pitt had by the end of the century been forced by weight of responsibility, accompanied by changed circumstances, into a position widely different from that of his younger days. He probably spoke his considered opinion when, three years later than the delivery of the speech which has just been noticed, he observed with regard to Ireland: 'There may be occasions, but they will ever be few, when an appeal to the people is the just mode of proceeding on important subjects.'² Fox, on the other hand, tended steadily in a democratic direction; and his withdrawal from Parliament at the end of the session was, perhaps, a proof of his real conviction that the defects in the representation rendered the whole parliamentary system a calamitous farce.

¹ 33 Parl. Hist. 709-11.

² 35 Parl. Hist. 83-4.

§ 6. The election of 1784

The election of 1784, at which the younger Pitt routed the Fox-North coalition, holds a singular position among eighteenth-century elections and demands separate remarks. Its influence in the development of the principle of the mandate was not, it seems, as large as writers on political history have, until the last few years, implied. Although the words of the King's Speech prior to the dissolution of Parliament—that His Majesty felt it a duty to 'recur to the sense of his people' by calling a new Parliament—were quoted on more than one occasion in the nineteenth century in order to justify appeals to the people of a more authentic character, recent historical research has proved that even the narrow electorate of 1784 did not have the opportunity, in any genuine sense, of pronouncing judgement on the question of the King versus the Whig families, the Indian question, or, indeed, any other question. It was convenient for Pitt to frame the Speech on behalf of the King, and to address the House, as if the people were to determine the course of politics; and to speak after the election as if it had been open to the people to declare their views on the situation. Doubtless, expressions such as these led to the notion that the people had at last been able to revolt against the state of dependence and repression under which the Whig régime had placed them for several decades. As a fact, the result of the election of 1784 was due to a complex variety of causes, of which the voting of the electors was only one. The marshalling of a strong body of members, who were interested in defeating the steps by which it was thought that the Fox-North coalition was attempting to gain a party advantage out of the revision of the constitution of East India, was probably as important an element in the victory as any turnover in the votes of the electorate.

The King had, say, a hundred 'Friends' in Parliament; and Pitt, though having but some fifty adherents, seems to have discovered that the mishandling of the India Bill by the Fox-North Ministry, in the autumn of 1783, would give him, if reinforced by the support of the Crown, an opportunity, which had not existed earlier in the year, to enlarge his forces. There was warrant for an attempt to oust those who had presumed to dictate to the Sovereign. It might be possible, he reckoned, by attaching to himself those concerned with the East India Company, as well as those who were likely to follow the chances of royal favour, to organize a majority in the House of Commons. In other words, it is tolerably clear that what has been described as a great victory was a victory in management only and did not represent any signal advance in the power of the people.

The various circumstances, mentioned in this chapter as proof of the inability of the people in the eighteenth century to act as a decisive factor in politics, are nearly all present in the election of 1784. There was no straightforward division into parties which could enable issues to be framed and submitted. Apart from the ambiguities following from the unprincipled alliance between Fox and North, the scanty party loyalties of the period had been disturbed by the recent reassortment of groups in Parliament, which made any attempt by party agents to estimate the strength of parties an almost impossible task. The investigation which has been made into the preparations, calculations, and attitude of John Robinson, the great party organizer enlisted on Pitt's behalf, proves that little, if any, consideration was given to the effect which the views of the electors on any of the public questions of the day might have on the election results. 'Interest' was of much greater importance.

The form of election addresses prepared for constituencies with popular franchise in 1784 does not seem to suggest that candidates offered alternative programmes to their electors more generally in this election than in any other eighteenth-century election.¹ The addresses of Fox and his opponents in the famous Westminster contest of 1784 contain the usual empty verbiage characteristic of the election addresses of the time. Those of Lord Hood and Sir Cecil Wray contained no reference to the political situation, but merely such expressions as 'high and important trust', 'zeal and fidelity', and 'conformity to your wishes and sentiments'; while the only reference in those of Fox (there was more than one address) to public matters was concerned with the absence of justification for dissolution and with his intention to oppose 'that secret influence by which the present Administration was created'.²

But the small number of contests which took place in the election is the most convincing evidence that the people were not in fact in a position to decide anything by their votes. Only about a third of the members returned were under the necessity of going to the poll. It is absurd, therefore, to suppose that this election did much more than provide a nominal precedent for any extension of the powers of the people.

¹ Cf. remarks on the election for the County of Norfolk, p. 182 above.

² History of the Westminster Election, 1784, 2nd ed., pp. 87, 131, 187; and on the election generally see The Parliamentary Papers of John Robinson, 1774-84 (Camden Society), Introduction, pp. viii-x; also 31 E.H.R., pp. 224 ff., being an article on 'Public Opinion and the General Election of 1784', by W. T. Laprade.

CHAPTER IX

THE PEOPLE AND POLICY

§ 1. The great Reform Bill

INCIDENTS in politics, during the years just preceding the introduction of the great Reform Bill, prepared the public mind for the recognition of new constitutional principles. The necessity of obtaining the authority of the people for an important change of policy came under discussion in connexion with proposals for the relief of Roman Catholic disabilities. The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel had introduced and carried a measure of Roman Catholic Emancipation in 1829, though indisputably pledged, in a general sense, to the opposite policy. A critical situation was precipitated by the Clare Election of 1828; and there is no doubt that the motives which prompted their action were entirely public spirited. But, as Lecky has observed,

‘a Ministry pledged to resist a particular measure, introduced and carried it, and did so without any appeal to the electors. The justification was that the measure in their eyes had become absolutely necessary to the public welfare, and that the condition of politics made it impossible for them either to carry it by a dissolution or to resign the task into other hands.’¹

It was argued, even in 1829, that a politician in the position of Peel should not suddenly change his publicly acknowledged attitude to a great national question without giving the electorate an opportunity to declare upon it. Peel, in introducing the measure for Roman Catholic relief, endeavoured to vindicate his change of front by challenging the contention that the people were opposed to concession. For this purpose he referred back, as has been seen, to the circumstances of the last preceding general election, that of 1826. He said that the general election was the time for public opinion to declare itself, that public opinion should be gathered by the exercise of the elective franchise and not merely at public meetings: strong admissions for a statesman who was shortly to bemoan, in debates on the Reform Bill, the prospect of the enlargement of the powers of the people and of the diminution of the preponderance of the Legislature. He proceeded to the analysis of the election results of the county and large city constituencies, to which reference has been made in the foregoing chapter.¹ By his endeavour, then, to avoid the criticism which was levelled against him on the ground of his breach of pledge Peel involved himself in the acceptance of the principle that policy should follow the declaration of public opinion expressed by the votes of the electorate.

¹ W. E. H. Lecky, Map of Life, pp. 138 ff.; and cf. the remarks of the Earl of Shaftesbury, quoted in E. Hodder, The Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, vol. 1, pp. 86-7.

There were many signs during the two or three years before the fight over the great Reform Bill that there was a quickening of interest in the subject of Reform. The middle classes were beginning to follow the lead of the working-men in pressing for representation. The subject, which had from time to time been raised in Parliament during the preceding half-century, was once more brought forward in the House of Commons in the early part of 1830. Although the 'glorious days of July' in the Paris revolution served to intensify the atmosphere in the latter part of the general election of 1830 in England, Reform can hardly be said to have been an issue in that election;² but, even before the French influence took effect, the question of Reform had been much in the air, as a result particularly of the agitation of local Political Unions. Between the dissolution of Parliament in July and its meeting in October strikes and revolts in various parts of the country proved that the masses were intent upon some improvement in their political, as well as their economic, position. It was the realization that at last the middle classes had been aroused from their state of lethargy and were no longer willing to be left without effective part in the business of government that induced Lord Grey to resume his place as a leader of the Reform movement. Immediately on the re-assembly of Parliament, the Duke of Wellington raised a storm of indignation by his cavalier treatment of a comment on the absence of any measure of Reform from the King's Speech; and, as an indirect result, Lord Grey within a few days succeeded him in office.

The extent to which Lord Grey's earlier attitude in the matter cast an obligation on him and his Ministry to endeavour to introduce legislation was mentioned by him shortly after the Reform Bill was introduced on 1 March 1831. The new Prime Minister said that he gathered from the preceding speech of the Duke of Wellington that it was admitted that a strong desire among the people to procure revision of the franchise had been manifested at the general election, and that it was impossible for the Government to avoid giving that subject its earliest consideration. For his own part, he regarded parliamentary reform as a condition of his acceptance of office: he considered himself 'pledged to it when out of office, and still more when in office, from a sense of public duty'.¹ Lord Grey felt that he was not only justified in bringing in a measure for Reform, but that he was even under an obligation to do so, although the question had not been specifically placed before the people at an election. He had, for many years, held himself out as a keen exponent of democratic principles; and, since there were obvious indications that public opinion was moving rapidly in favour of legislation, he felt himself bound to put his professions into practice. As matters turned out, a general election became necessary in 1831, at which an express mandate was given for the passing of the Reform Bill. The King's Speech prior to the dissolution of April 1831 stated in the most unambiguous terms that there was to be referred to the people, not merely the question of the support of the Ministry, but the question whether or not a Reform Bill was to be passed. It was hardly necessary that the issue should be defined in the formal Speech. It was blazed abroad and adopted in every constituency in which there was a contest. Lord John Russell, speaking two days after the dissolution, in support of the Reform candidate at Southwark, thus interpreted the King's Speech to the electors:

¹ 20 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 737 and p. 190 above.

² Cf. the arguments of Gladstone and of Asquith on this subject later in the century; 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1547; 29 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 813.

'On this occasion the electors had more than a common duty to perform, for they were called upon not merely to select men the best fitted to defend their rights and interests, but to answer by their conduct this question put to the electors of the empire by His Majesty in dissolving Parliament: "Do you approve—ay or no—of the principle of a reform in the representation?"'²

The distinction between the appeal to the people in 1784 and that of 1831 lies chiefly in the clear submission, in the latter instance, of a question of policy. It was even contended that matters had gone a stage farther and that the people were asked to determine upon the form in which the measure should be enacted. The Duke of Wellington observed that in 1784 the people were not called upon to deliberate on any measure, but were appealed to in favour of the men whom the King had named as his Ministers. But he alleged, truly enough, that, in the case of 1831, the reference was 'not whether the King was to be supported in naming his Ministers—not whether Parliament was to be reformed, because, upon the principle of reform, there was a majority in the late House of Commons, but upon a particular plan of reform which was accordingly discussed throughout the country'. He charged the Ministry with having been the cause of the unconstitutional practice, hitherto unknown, of electing delegates for a particular purpose rather than 'to deliberate upon matters of common concern, and to decide according to the best of their judgment, after such deliberation and debate'.¹ Similar views were also expressed in the House of Commons.

¹ 3 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1075-6.

² The Times, 26 Apr. 1831.

Peel did not display, in connexion with the Reform Bill, the same anxiety to comply with the people's views as he had in 1829. In his speech in the House of Commons on the introduction of the Bill in March 1831 he showed himself far from ready for the reference to the people which was to set the seal on their capacity to determine the main lines of the policy of government. He preferred 'the reason and calm judgment of this House' to 'some intrinsic and higher authority—the feelings and wishes of the people'.²

When it became increasingly clear, as the country grew more and more insistent, that a considerable extension of the franchise would have to be enacted by one side or the other, he became resigned to the necessity of Parliament following the will of the people expressed by their votes on a great national issue. By so doing he accepted a principle which was more important than the contents of the Bill.

'If the people of England,' he admitted with obvious reluctance in the autumn of 1831, 'after meditating on these things—on the condition of foreign states—on the signs and indications at home, of the probable consequences of this measure of reform, still insist on its completion—this deliberate resolve will, no doubt, prevail; I shall bow to their judgment with the utmost respect; but my own opinions will remain unchanged.'³

Although Home Secretary in the Ministry of Lord Grey, Lord Melbourne, as is well known, was not an enthusiastic supporter of Reform. His axiom of 'Why not leave it alone?'

¹ 7 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1193.

² 2 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1339.

³ 7 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 458.

truly epitomized his attitude towards any advanced proposals. During the autumn debates, however, on the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, after maintaining in a characteristic passage the propriety of resisting the will of the people, he suddenly and with dramatic force asserted that Parliament had sufficiently resisted the pressure for Reform and that the sustained demand for legislation, authentically expressed, must be met.¹

It is unnecessary to recount the various shifts and expedients by which the Opposition tried to maintain a hopeless rearguard action. During the winter and spring of 1831-2 Lord Harrowby, Lord Wharncliffe, and others (known as 'the waverers') tried to arrange an accommodation. And by the critical stage of April 1832 several of the Tory peers were willing to admit their agreement with Lord Harrowby, who was bold enough to declare in debate that the Opposition in the House of Lords could no longer hope to resist the measure, 'which the House of Commons had sanctioned for a second time by a large majority, and in favour of which the people of England had expressed a decided opinion'.²

As a result of the passing of the Act of 1832 the principle of the extension of the franchise was secured. It was put into effective practice by the Act of 1867; and later Reform Acts have carried the principle, it may be assumed, near the limit of its application. But another principle of capital importance was, as has been remarked, secured at the time of the passing of the first Reform Bill. It was indisputably established that the people could decide questions of policy by their votes at general elections. The full effect of this principle was not realized for some years, although a few shrewd observers seem quickly to have appreciated what had happened. Among these was Cobbett, who pointed out, in his trenchant articles in The Political Register in the summer of 1832, that the taking of pledges had assumed a new complexion with new possibilities. 'We all know', he said, 'that, if the House of Commons had not been pledged, we should have no Reform Bill.' He did not speak merely of single members being pledged, but of the House of Commons. He insisted that 'the bill which has just been passed into a law is not the end, but the means of reform; and that, although it confers upon a certain portion of the community of this Kingdom the power of carrying into execution every measure of civil and ecclesiastical reform which the exigencies of the times and the just and reasonable desires of the people can possibly require, yet that everything depends upon the manner in which the new body of electors are disposed to exercise the power which is now placed in their hands of choosing proper persons to represent the wants, interests and opinions of the whole community in the reformed House of Commons. . . .'¹

¹ 7 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1177-8.

² 12 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 150.

It is fairly certain that few of the Ministers responsible for the passing of the great Reform Bill saw the prospects of the new era as clearly as Cobbett. Indeed, many of them regarded, or affected to regard, that measure as a final settlement of the problem of democratic government.² But, although an incomplete understanding of what is, perhaps, now generally regarded as an essential object of general elections (the choice, that is to say, of Ministries or policies) was to persist for some time, nevertheless the period of the Bill of 1832 must be looked back on as the most critical in the history of the development of the people's part in government. The seed was then sown; and the fruit has, in the opinion of many, done it full credit.

Details respecting the degree in which the franchise was extended by the Reform Act of 1832 do not directly concern the present topic. It is enough to observe that the Act deposited electoral power in the hands of considerably less than one million voters in a population of twenty-four millions, and that the lower middle classes soon exhibited their active discontent at a measure which has since been described as having promoted the 'undue predominance of the bourgeoisie'.³ It must be remembered, however, that, at the time, the redistribution of seats was regarded as just as important a feature in the Act as the increase in the number of voters. Even the progress which was attained by the enlargement of the electorate was to a great extent neutralized by various forms of corruption and chicanery which grew up under the new régime. Bribery had, of course, flourished before the Act in those constituencies where the number of voters was so large that seats could not be purchased outright. But, under the new arrangements, the bribery of voters in a greater number of constituencies than before reduced to a considerable extent the benefits attributable to a smaller trade in seats. Moreover, the introduction for the first time of a system of registration or official listing of voters, under the provisions of the Act of 1832, gave unscrupulous party agents opportunities to influence the casting of votes in an improper manner.

¹ Cobbett's Political Register, vol. lxxvi, p. 677; vol. lxxvii, pp. 2, 22 ff.

² Although Peel adopted this view, he had, in the early debates on the Bill, criticized the proposed changes on the ground that they were bound to lead to more extensive concessions; see 2 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1345-6.

³ Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli (new ed.), vol. ii, p. 1515.

Some ineffective attempts were made prior to 1832 to check corrupt practices. As early as 1695 a statute, 7 & 8 William III, c. 4, aimed at reducing bribery by candidates; and another statute, 2 George II, c. 24, made an almost equally fruitless attempt at preventing voters from accepting bribes. But the Acts of 1854 and 1883 both had beneficial results in checking the abuses of corruption, as also did the introduction of an enlightened system of trying election petitions in 1868. Nevertheless, it is true that, throughout a large part of the nineteenth century, the working of incipient democracy was hindered by a degree of corruption not much less than that of the preceding century, though of a different kind. Between 1832 and 1872 a vast amount of intimidation was practised; and in some respects the benefits of the wider franchise were discounted more by intimidation than by corruption. This serious interference with the free exercise of the franchise was largely removed by the introduction of the ballot in 1872.¹ Although, then, in theory political power passed, in 1832, from the upper to the middle classes, there were still, for many years, stumbling-blocks in the way of a genuine transfer.

§ 2. Peel and Melbourne

A subject so compelling in importance as that of Reform was not to force its way as an issue into every general election. But if issues, even of less concern, were to be explicitly and adequately submitted to the people at elections, it would be necessary to adopt a practice by which they should be published and explained in programmes put forward by party leaders. Such a practice was initiated, oddly enough, by Peel; and, as happened with him on more than one occasion, he repented at leisure of his precipitancy.

Upon his unexpected appointment as Prime Minister, after the dismissal of Melbourne in 1834 and while Parliament was not sitting, he saw that he could have no hope of obtaining a majority unless he found some means of laying his policy before the country. He could not explain his programme in Parliament; and he and his colleagues decided that the best way of effecting a similar result was to outline the policy of the Ministry in a manifesto nominally addressed by him to his own constituents at Tamworth, but actually addressed to the electorate at large. He drafted this address, obtained the approval of the Cabinet to it, and sent copies to the London daily press.

¹ The comparative effects of corruption and intimidation were considered by Macaulay in the opening passages of his speech to his electors at Edinburgh on 29 May 1839. Writings and Speeches (1882 ed.), p. 574.

Peel's address at once became famous under the title of the Tamworth Manifesto. As Greville remarked, it made a 'prodigious sensation';¹ and well it might.

'When before did a Prime Minister think it expedient to announce to the people, not only his acceptance of office, but the principles and even the details of the measures which he intended to produce, and to solicit—not from Parliament, but from the people—that they would so far maintain the prerogative of the King as to give the Ministers of his choice not indeed an implicit confidence, but a fair trial. In former times such a proceeding would have been thought derogatory and impugned as unconstitutional, and would have been both; but the new circumstances in which the Reform Bill has placed the Crown, by making its choice of Ministers immediately and absolutely dependent on the choice of the several constituencies, and, in the first instance, quite independent of the concurrence of the assembled parliament, have rendered such a course not merely expedient, but inevitable.'²

Thus spoke the oracle of Conservatism, the Quarterly Review. It is true that the article which thus disclosed the novelty of the proceeding was written in defence of Peel's conduct (almost certainly by Croker); but the writer did not refrain from emphasizing the significance of the departure.

Cobbett, who, as has been seen, had a very broad conception of the effects of the passing of the Reform Bill, could not resist twitting Peel on his method of appealing to the people. Why were the people of Tamworth entitled to a full declaration of Peel's principles? It was proper for him to make such a declaration in his capacity as member of Parliament; but what was the reason for 'selecting them as a channel, through which to make this general manifesto?'³

¹ Journal of Reigns of George IV and William IV, vol. iii, p. 178.

² 53 Quarterly Review, p. 265 (Apr. 1835).

³ Cobbett's Political Register, vol. lxxxvi, p. 771.

Peel stated in his manifesto that he felt it incumbent upon him to enter into a declaration of his views of public policy, and that he availed himself of what he regarded as a legitimate opportunity of communicating to the public at large 'that frank exposition of general principles and views which appears to be anxiously expected and which it ought not to be the inclination, and cannot be the interest of a Minister of this country to withhold'. The Reform Bill, he explained, constituted a new era; and it was the duty of a Minister to declare explicitly, first whether he would maintain the Bill itself, and, secondly, whether he would act upon the spirit in which it was conceived. He expressed himself as prepared to maintain the Bill as 'a final and irrevocable settlement of a great constitutional question'; and, if willingness to adopt the spirit of the Bill did not involve more than a fair review of existing institutions and redress of abuses and grievances without infringing on established rights, he and his colleagues were prepared to subscribe to those principles.¹

The chances of Peel's Ministry at the polls were undoubtedly improved as a result of the publication of the manifesto, though a clear majority was not obtained. But Peel himself soon came to recognize that the exigencies of his sudden appointment and of the peculiar political situation had driven him to undertake a course which might prove a troublesome precedent. In writing to his friend Croker in 1835, he admitted that the Tamworth Manifesto 'too much referred to necessities imposed by the Reform Bill'; and he expressed the view that 'the necessities rather arose from the abruptness of the change in the Government, and, to say the truth, from the policy of aiding our friends at the election'.² This was certainly so. In his desire to obtain support from the enlarged electorate, Peel had committed himself to more advanced views than those which he afterwards cared to maintain.

Much assistance was obtained by the Whigs, in the election of 1834, from a tract written by Edward Lytton Bulwer (as he then was) entitled A Letter to a Late Cabinet Minister on the Present Crisis. This tract had an immediate and immense popularity and a circulation in excess of any similar publication. It not only insisted on a maintenance of the policy of Reform, but it also recognized the new effect which was to be given to general elections. 'Remember', he said, 'that you are . . . now fighting for things, not men—for the real consequences of your reform.' This tract was not in any way an official product of the Whig party; but its widespread influence on the course of the election ensured that votes were given for 'things' as well as for 'men'. It was, therefore, due to the attitude of both sides that the election of 1834 marked an advance towards democratic government.

¹ Memoirs, vol. ii, pp. 58 ff.

² Croker Papers, vol. ii, p. 256.

Expediency has, somewhat naturally, influenced politicians, either consciously or unconsciously, in their views of the admissibility of the mandate. An alternation in their attitude can often be distinguished. When faced with the immediate prospect of a general election, they have found it convenient to produce an attractive policy and to appeal to the people upon it, in the hope of securing a majority. When confronted in the House of Commons with the prospect of a dissolution in circumstances which suggested that a general election would not bring about a result favourable to them, they have contended that the occasion was not an appropriate one for an appeal to the people. If in power, they have seen no reason why an important measure should not be passed without 'going to the country'; but if in opposition, with the tide turning in their favour, they have expressed themselves as shocked at the prospect of some new principle of legislation being undertaken without its being submitted to the electorate.

The incidents leading up to the dissolution of Parliament in 1841 illustrated not only a change in the attitude of Peel from that implied by the Tamworth Manifesto, but also a strange failure to apprehend the new function of dissolutions of Parliament, which the events of 1831 and 1832 had required. The Melbourne Ministry, growing in popular discredit without realizing it, owing largely to its failure to cope with the difficulties produced by the financial depression, were defeated on a question of finance, but remained in office. Many of the Whig Ministers, as well as the Whigs generally, were keen to have a dissolution; but Melbourne was steadily opposed to it. He held the old-fashioned view, which was also shared by Peel, that the Crown ought never to make an appeal to the people unless it was fairly certain that the Ministry would obtain a majority, however much the political situation might call for an expression of the people's views. Melbourne's Ministry did not decide, as a Ministry might to-day, that, having been defeated on an important question, it should give the electors an opportunity of choosing between it and an alternative Ministry, but decided that the state of public opinion should be sounded and a dissolution resorted to only if there were found to be a strong probability of the Ministry securing a majority at an election.¹ Sir John Hobhouse was one of the few politicians on either side who had a clear and progressive conception of the proper function of a general election. He protested, in the Cabinet, against the question of dissolution being made to depend on the likelihood of obtaining a majority in the new Parliament, and he asserted that an appeal to the country was for the purpose of ascertaining its opinion. This seems to be self-evident to-day; but it was very far from being so in 1841.²

Within a few days of the defeat of the Melbourne Ministry Peel proposed a motion of want of confidence, at the same time contending that, if his motion proved successful, the occasion was not a proper one for Melbourne to advise a dissolution. It was dangerous, he said, to admit any other recognized organ of public opinion than the House of Commons; and he added that, if the Ministry considered that it was appropriate to refer the situation to the opinion of the constituencies, the indications of recent by-elections clearly suggested that a majority of the constituencies were opposed to the Ministry. In the event of a general election he would not submit a policy to the people. According to the standards of the present day Peel would have felt bound, on carrying his motion and on succeeding Melbourne in office, to take the earliest opportunity of submitting himself to the electors; and the fact that he estimated that the general feeling in the country was opposed to the Whigs should, it might be supposed, have encouraged him to advise a dissolution.

Sir John Hobhouse, on behalf of the Ministry, replied to Peel that he could not see why the time was inopportune for an appeal to the people. Why should not they, if defeated in the House of Commons, lay their policy and principles before the country? He furthermore charged Peel with inconsistency in respect of his attitude towards the issue of election programmes.

"The right honourable Baronet has said . . . that he shall not make any particular exposition of his principles. But, when the right honourable Baronet came into office in 1834, he thought differently. He then thought it right to make an exposition of his political principles in his famous Tamworth Manifesto. . . . He did not then deem it improper to make an appeal to the country.'

¹ Greville, Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, 1837-52, vol. ii, pp. 1-2; Lord Broughton, Recollections of a Long Life, vol. vi, pp. 26-8.

² Lord Broughton, Recollections of a Long Life, vol. vi, p. 20.

The precedent of 1831, for referring questions of policy to the people at general elections, was expressly adopted by Lord John Russell, the leader of the Liberals in the House of Commons. After discussing the alternative between resignation and advising an appeal to the country, he said:

'On a subject of so much importance to the people [as the fiscal question] I feel that it is our bounden duty to offer such advice to her Majesty as we may think will ensure the decision of it by the electors of the realm, duly consulted upon the question.'

¹

Much against Melbourne's better judgement, and to the subsequent regret of the Queen herself, the Ministry, after having been defeated on Peel's motion by one vote, advised a dissolution rather than resignation. The Queen's Speech prior to the dissolution exhibited a democratic strain. The general election was to take place so as to provide an opportunity of ascertaining 'the sense of my people upon matters which so deeply concern their welfare'. In this formal way, therefore, the people were asked to demonstrate by their votes how they were disposed towards alternative financial policies.

The Duke of Wellington's mistrust of the increase in the powers of the people was awakened by the form of the Queen's Speech, just as it was in 1831. He criticized the character of the appeal to the people as going farther in a democratic direction than any earlier instance. Melbourne justified the terms of the Speech by reference to the precedent of 1784; and he said that the later Speech seemed to him the milder of the two. The Duke, however, insisted that the circumstances of 1784 were entirely different, since, in that instance, the dispute was essentially one between prerogative and privilege and was 'exclusively a question in the House of Commons'.² The distinction between the election of 1784 and that of 1831 has already been discussed; and the same principles of distinction apply to a large extent between the elections of 1784 and 1841. Melbourne would, perhaps, have been on safer ground if he had justified the form of the Queen's Speech by referring to the circumstances of the election of

¹ 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 817-18, 850-1, 1212 ff.

² 59 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 77, 81.

1831; but he may not have had sufficient time to produce the most effective reply, or he may not have taken very seriously the rigid and reactionary views of the venerable statesman.

Peel's vacillation in the matter of the appropriateness of appeals to the people, as well as his conservative understanding of the true purpose of a dissolution, is again illustrated in the period between his repeal of the Corn Laws and his resignation in 1846. He undoubtedly regretted the failure of the Liberals to form a Ministry in 1845, since he would thus have been saved the opprobrium of introducing a policy which was in direct opposition to the principles which he had upheld during the whole of his preceding political career and particularly at the last general election, that of 1841. But at the time of preparing for the introduction of the repeal of the Corn Laws he refused to appeal to the constituencies, for the reason that the question was one arousing too keen an interest to be so determined.

'It appeared to me', he said in his Memoirs, 'that there were grave objections to the proposal that we should notify to the constituent body on the eve of a general election the intention to repeal the Corn Laws for the express purpose of inviting an expression of their opinion on that particular subject. I thought such an appeal would ensure a bitter conflict between different classes of society, and would preclude the possibility of a dispassionate consideration by a Parliament, the members of which would have probably committed themselves by explicit declaration and pledges. . . .'

It might surely have been thought that a question of sufficient importance to be raised as an issue in every constituency should be settled by a general election. This, however, was not the way in which the problem presented itself to Peel, who continued his apologia in terms which seem to suggest consideration for every other aspect of the situation but that which concerned the rights of the people.¹

He was well aware that he would be severely criticized for his change of front regarding the Corn Laws; but he cannot have suspected the asperity and the virulence with which Disraeli was to denounce his apostasy. In January 1846 the measure for abolishing the Corn Laws was introduced; and Disraeli lost no time in charging Peel with having neglected to obtain the opinion of the people on proposed legislation diametrically opposed in tenor to the principles embraced by the Ministry at the last general election. At the outset Disraeli seized upon Peel's vindication of his retention of office, on the ground that no Liberal Ministry could be formed, as incapable of being sustained. In his first important speech on this topic, he complained that it was not 'a legitimate trial of the principles of free trade against the principles of protection, if a Parliament, the majority of which are elected to support protection, be gained over to free trade by the arts of the very individual whom they were elected to support in an opposite career'.¹

¹ Sir Robert Peel's Memoirs, vol. ii, pp. 163, 166, 167.

As soon as Peel had secured the passage of his free trade legislation the defeat of his Ministry in the House of Commons forced him to decide whether to resign or to advise a dissolution of Parliament. He did not find this decision very easy. The Conservative party was split in two: free trade had been carried chiefly, of course, by Liberal votes. It seemed impossible for him to obtain a working majority. There is to be found in his Memoirs a memorandum, prepared for Cabinet use a day or two before he decided to resign, in which he reviewed the possible questions on which an effective appeal could be made to the electors in the event of a dissolution. He reiterated his firmly rooted notion that a Minister ought never to advise a dissolution without having a conviction that a victory at the polls is morally certain. It is curious that it did not appear to have occurred to him that a Minister might be under an obligation to the people to give them an opportunity of deciding a question of policy, regardless of what the probable result of that election might be. He remained an ardent supporter of a view of the Crown's position which was becoming—or, indeed, had become—obsolete. No one would say now, as Peel said then, that 'unsuccessful dissolutions are, generally speaking, injurious to the authority of the Crown' and that the prerogative of dissolution is 'a great instrument to the Crown for its protection'. But these views were widely held and were, naturally enough, approved by Queen Victoria. Peel expressed the opinion that the dissolution of 1841 was unjustifiable and concluded that the proposed dissolution, if likely to have the same result, would be equally unjustifiable.²

¹ 83 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 122; see also his speech in a later debate (83 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1320).

² Letters of Queen Victoria (1st series), vol. ii, pp. 95, 107–8; Sir Robert Peel's Memoirs, vol. ii, pp. 202 ff.

Within almost a few hours of Peel's deliberations on this subject it became obvious that his party had no prospect whatever of success at the polls; and he announced to Parliament his immediate resignation of office. He did not tell the House that resignation had been chosen because the alternative was impossible, in the sense that it would prove unsuccessful for the Ministry. He preferred to explain that, owing to the abolition of the Corn Laws having been carried, dissolution had become unnecessary. His explanation is in some respects puzzling. It emphasizes the fact that he did not regard dissolution from the people's point of view. He considered the Crown, he considered his party; but he evidently found it difficult to regard himself as under obligations to the people.

'We have advised her Majesty', Peel informed the House of Commons, 'to accept our resignation at once, without adopting that alternative to which we might have resorted—namely, recommended to the Crown the exercise of its prerogative, and the dissolution of the present Parliament. I do not hesitate to avow, speaking with a frankness that I trust will offend no one, that if her Majesty's Government had failed in carrying, in all their integrity, the main measures of commercial policy which it was my duty to recommend, that there is no exertion that I would not have made—no sacrifice that I would not have incurred—in order to ensure the ultimate success of those measures, or at any rate to give the country an opportunity of pronouncing its opinion on the subject. For such a purpose I should have felt justified in advising dissolution, because I think the continuance of doubt and uncertainty on such important matters would have been a greater evil than the resort to a constitutional mode of ascertaining the opinion of the nation. But there has been fortunately no necessity for a dissolution of Parliament upon that ground.'¹

Peel's supposition that, although he found it unnecessary to appeal to the people before he succeeded in repealing the Corn Laws, he might have had to appeal to them after he had failed, was certainly not disingenuous; but it is characteristic of his outlook in regard to this aspect of constitutional practice. The passage quoted above is full of points which arouse criticism. One of the most obvious is the inference that 'the resort to a constitutional mode of ascertaining the opinion of the nation' was an evil to be suffered. It is not fair, however, to examine too closely the words of a speech in

¹ 87 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1042.

Parliament, even though it is one for which the occasion demanded careful preparation.

In 1847, the year following that in which the Corn Laws were abolished, the Liberals dissolved Parliament; and Peel, although he had found cause to regret the Tamworth Manifesto of 1834, rushed ardently into the general election struggle and issued another manifesto to his constituency, which was generally described as such, and which was expressed in terms that proved it to be intended for the whole electorate. It was enthusiastically accepted by his followers as the programme of the 'Peelites'. In this manifesto he reviewed, and attempted a justification of, his policy towards the Roman Catholics and his repeal of the Corn Laws. And he stated that it was his earnest hope that his constituents would make their choice of a representative exclusively on public grounds—that they would not permit the consideration of mere personal regard to influence their judgement.¹

The precedent of the Tamworth Manifesto of 1834 proved itself to be firmly established at the election of 1847. It was followed by all parties. The Protectionists, led by Lord George Bentinck, regarded his manifesto-letter to his constituency at King's Lynn as descriptive of their official policy; and the Liberal party accepted the main speech of Lord John Russell in support of his candidature in the City of London as signifying its programme. Henceforward it was a matter of routine for each party to have a common plan to present to the people; and in this way the practicability of deciding issues was increased.²

§ 3. Disraeli and Gladstone

The vicissitudes of politics scarcely allow politicians to maintain an undeviating course of principle. It is repeatedly found that the axioms expounded by them in opposition sometimes have to be forgotten amid the pressure and problems of office. Disraeli's caustic criticisms of Peel's volte-face over the repeal of the Corn Laws were to a modified extent applicable to his own record in connexion with the passing of the Reform Act of 1867. His party, in 1865, was nearly as heavily pledged to some measure of Reform as was that of the Liberals. With the help of renegades from the Liberal ranks, he succeeded in defeating Gladstone's Reform Bill of 1866 on no other ground than that it was too extreme a measure. On coming into office, on the resignation of the Liberals, Disraeli was faced with a critical situation in the country, which seemed to be moving from unrest in the direction of rebellion; and conciliatory steps were clearly required in order to ensure the national welfare. By a leadership, which has been described as 'a masterpiece of unscrupulous adroitness',¹ he secured successive amendments to the Reform Bill which he introduced, and so rendered it, in effect, more extreme than that of the Liberals.

¹ C. Taylor and C. Mackay, Life and Times of Sir Robert Peel, vol. iv, pp. 194, 195, 222.

² Cf. Chapter XI, § 2, below.

It may be contended that the state of the country not only forbade an appeal to the people, but also dictated a bolder measure than that proposed by the Liberals. And it is hardly necessary to read Disraeli's Coningsby and his Sybil to ensure the conviction that the terms of his Bill were in consonance with his genuine political tenets. Nevertheless, he plainly transgressed the principles of the relation of public opinion to party which he had upheld at the time of Peel's apostasy in 1846. A party which had succeeded to office as a result of adopting a particular policy, namely moderation in Reform, had been responsible for legislation involving an entirely different policy, without any submission to the people. The incident provides a close analogy to Peel's conversion to the necessity of meeting the Roman Catholic claims in 1829.

It is, perhaps, fair to observe that, owing to the increase in the extent of popular agitation in the second half of 1866, it would have been easier for Russell to have advised dissolution instead of resignation immediately after his defeat on Reform in June 1866, than for Disraeli to have appealed to the people soon after accession to office. Judged according to the standards of the present day, Russell's insistence on resignation was not justifiable. But, even at that time, there were many who thought that dissolution was the proper course for the Liberals to choose. Gladstone told Russell that the objections to dissolution were superficial, that the temporary loss of supporters and the inconvenience of a quickly repeated general election were of less importance than the maintenance of the principles of the Constitution, which, in his view, required dissolution.² Russell's chief reason for resignation was a peculiar one. He was apparently of the opinion that there was a general apathy in the south of England on the subject of Reform, an estimate which was soon to prove fallacious.¹

¹ W. E. H. Lecky, The Map of Life, pp. 138 ff.

² The Later Correspondence of Lord John Russell, vol. ii, p. 351.

No one suggested that, on Russell's failure to dissolve, Disraeli should have appealed to the people, for no other reason than that he was under an obligation to obtain a new lease of authority. The convention which required a dissolution at the time of a change of Ministries was not yet settled. It subsequently became almost an invariable rule that there should be an appeal to the people as soon as practicable after the change from a Ministry of one party to that of another.

The dissensions raised by the question of Reform soon yielded place in the field of politics to Gladstone's sudden and sensational proposals in regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. On being defeated by a large majority on a vote respecting this question, Disraeli, acting fully in pursuance of the constitutional convention as recognized to-day, determined not to resign but to advise a dissolution so as to obtain the ruling of the people. One of the reasons given by him in the House of Commons for regarding dissolution as the proper course to adopt was the absence of any previous opportunity for the people to declare upon the question at issue in a general election.

Gladstone, however, did not want a general election; and he argued that, where a Minister was defeated by any majority of more than a very small number, he should resign and should not have the privilege of appealing to the people. He cited in his favour the defeat of Peel in 1846, when Peel did not dissolve but resigned—an un instructive example, as has already been observed.² And he mentioned as inapplicable Melbourne's dissolution on being defeated merely by one vote in 1841.³

The necessity of submitting to the people a new political proposal of very general interest before it was introduced in Parliament was debated in the House of Lords. The Conservative Lord Chancellor (Cairns) emphasized the constitutional importance of Gladstone's new proposal and the fact that it had never been referred to the constituencies; and he asserted that the earliest occasion should be taken of obtaining the views of the people. On the Liberal side, Earl Grey used the argument, which was heard at the time of the debates on the first Reform Bill and which was again to be adopted in the later part of the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth centuries, to the effect that the reference of projected legislation to the electorate would turn Parliament into an assembly of delegates.¹ This argument is obviously based on too extreme a view; and it is easy to reply that only proposals of particular or of constitutional importance should, if opportunity and the safety of the State permit, be submitted to the people. It may be freely admitted that, in regard to ordinary legislation, Parliament should be left to use its discretion, provided that a Ministry does not act in a manner that is inconsistent with the principles under which office was assumed.

¹ Letters of Queen Victoria, 2nd series, vol. i, p. 335.

² See p. 213 above.

³ 191 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1710 ff.

As a result of the dissolution, the people declared with no uncertain voice for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The reasons for the victory of Gladstone at this election are not relevant to the present subject; but it is worth remarking that the people were in this instance provided with an unusually straightforward issue. Investigation into the practicability of inferring decisions by the people at elections proves that these decisions have only been plainly given on few occasions. In 1868 the issue of the disestablishment of the Irish Church was peculiar, since it was, to all intents, the sole issue before the people; and it was, moreover, an issue in respect of which the people of England could obtain no direct benefit, so that self-interest and partiality were eliminated in an exceptional degree.

The views of Melbourne and Peel, expressed in 1841 and 1846 respectively, that dissolutions should only be advised by a Ministry if likely to be successful, did not survive in the later Victorian period in the same simple form. The dignity of the Crown ceased to be regarded as being involved in appeals to the people. But, even then, appeals to the people were hardly regarded from the people's point of view. The party leaders, in considering the advisability of a dissolution, were more inclined, at that time as in more recent times, to dwell on party prospects rather than on the problem whether the welfare of the nation required a submission to the arbitrament of the people.

¹ 191 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1688-9.

A very remarkable instance of this frame of mind is provided by the controversy in which Disraeli and Gladstone were engaged in 1873. Gladstone, on being defeated in the House of Commons at the second reading of the Irish University Bill, resigned. The Queen sent for Disraeli, who told her that, as he had no stable majority, he was not prepared to take office, and that he could not advise a dissolution. The latter statement was evidently to be explained by his realization that the turn of his party would be better served by allowing Gladstone's already discredited Ministry to become further discredited. But this explanation naturally could not be expressed. Overtly, his contention was that he should not be forced to form a Government in the last months of an expiring Parliament, and that it would be difficult for a newly appointed Minister to frame issues at short notice and without the advantage of being in possession of official information.¹

A well-sustained correspondence was addressed to the Queen by the two statesmen, Gladstone alleging that it was incumbent on Disraeli to accept office, and Disraeli maintaining his refusal. Finally, Gladstone was forced to resume the position of Prime Minister. But what seems nowadays the oddest aspect of this controversy is the failure of both Gladstone and Disraeli to take a public-spirited view of the situation. 'That the continuance in office of a weakened and discredited Ministry was a grave evil, which only an appeal to the country could cure, does not seem to have impressed the mind either of Mr. Gladstone or of Mr. Disraeli.'²

The controversy between Gladstone and Salisbury in 1885, on the defeat of the former in a division on an amendment at the second reading of the Budget, had some few similarities to that of Gladstone and Disraeli in 1873; but some of the circumstances and the outcome were different. Gladstone's defeat in the House of Commons in 1885 was the result of an amendment by the official Opposition, although not on a very vital point. He then retained, it seems, a majority for his general policy. The natural course for Salisbury to adopt, after Gladstone's resignation and his appointment to office, would have been to dissolve Parliament. But, in this instance, that course was impossible for some months owing to the redistribution of seats (the result of the Reform Act) being in process. Consequently Salisbury cannot be blamed for not at once appealing to the people. And his claim to receive from Gladstone pledges to facilitate the transaction of public business while he remained in a minority was entirely justified, though he only secured from Gladstone some rather vague assurances.¹

¹ Salisbury accepted such a position in 1885; and his party suffered considerably as a result; but Campbell-Bannerman was highly successful in 1906, after having taken office at the end of the Parliament of 1900-5.

² Paul, A History of Modern England, vol. iii, pp. 310 ff.

There are to be found in debates in Parliament, soon after the Reform Act of 1867 was passed, occasional arguments to the effect that legislation of primary importance must be referred to the people before enactment. Evidently the widening of the franchise had the effect of encouraging democratic tendencies. Lord Salisbury was specially notable for the expression of these advanced views. In the debate on the proposals for the introduction of the ballot, in 1872, he asked the House of Lords to reject the Bill on the ground that the question had never been an election issue, and that the electorate had never had 'a fair opportunity of considering whether it likes the ballot or not'. He admitted that there was no rigid provision for reference to the people as there was in the United States of America or in Switzerland; but he thought that this absence of provision was a reason why the House of Lords should ensure, on the people's behalf, that the House of Commons, 'in thus tampering with the laws under which it was itself elected, had not transgressed the mandate it received'.²

Lord Salisbury's call to the House of Lords to maintain the mandate principle was repeated a few years later. The Reform Bill of 1884, which was introduced by Gladstone, was to confer the franchise on householders and lodgers in the counties in the same way that the Act of 1867 had conferred it on the same classes in the towns. About two million electors were to be added—that is to say, approximately the same number as that added by the Acts of 1832 and 1867 together. The Conservatives did not choose to fight this Reform Bill; but they attempted to delay it by an amendment in the House of Lords, as they were of opinion that it should be passed at the same time as a Bill for the redistribution of seats.

¹ See 298 Parl. Deb., 3 s. 1623 ff.

² 211 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1494-5. Lord Salisbury remarked on this occasion that the conception of the House of Commons as 'the expression of the opinion of the Nation' involved 'a constitutional fiction which it is convenient for practical purposes to respect; but which is only literally true on certain occasions and on certain subjects'.

It is doubtful whether the claim of the House of Lords to act as guardian of the people's liberties has ever aroused or will ever arouse much answering enthusiasm. In this instance the House of Lords, on adopting this role, became conscious that its solicitude evoked the opposite of approval in the country. Lord Salisbury, in his speech in the House, gave vent to democratic views which must have struck the older Liberals as in marked contrast to the old Tory outlook of 1831 and 1832. But perhaps the feature of his speech which is most interesting is the stress laid on the importance of consultation with the people where large constitutional changes were in contemplation.

'As a mere party matter,' he said, 'we have no desire to force a dissolution; but we do, with reference to this great revolution in the machinery for electing the members of the House of Commons—we do urge upon the Government, not only the prudence but the justice of consulting the people. We do urge upon them that they have no right to make these vast constitutional changes without formally consulting the opinions of those by whose authority they really, in the long run, make them, and whose interests will be specially affected. . . . In the presence of such vast proposals we appeal to the people.'¹

The Conservative plan was immediately interpreted by Gladstone to the people as an insidious claim on the part of the House of Lords to force a dissolution. Further consideration of the situation led Lord Salisbury to regard the prospects of his plan as doubtful; and, within a short time, he agreed to confer with Gladstone on the deadlock between the two Houses. An accommodation was quickly reached, much to the subsequent indignation of some members of the Conservative party. The provisions of a Redistribution Bill were settled, on the understanding that the House of Lords would pass the Reform Bill without forcing an appeal to the people. It thus became unnecessary for Lord Salisbury's protests on behalf of an outraged electorate to be pressed any farther.

Claims such as those which were made by Lord Salisbury in 1872 and 1884, that the House of Lords should exercise a guardianship on behalf of the people, helped to familiarize politicians with the principle of the mandate. The part played by the House of Lords in more recent years, between 1909 and 1911, raised questions in connexion with the application of that principle in a much more acute form. These questions will be noticed at the end of the present chapter.

¹ 290 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 468-9.

Shortly after the extension of the franchise effected by the Act of 1884 another great issue provided what is perhaps the best known illustration of the problem, how far important constitutional changes can be undertaken without reference to the people.

Prior to the election of 1885 projects for the self-government of Ireland had been cautiously ventilated by both parties. The Liberals knew as well as the Conservatives that to adopt Home Rule as a definite proposal would mean a break-up of party unity. They were anxious to avoid coercion; but they were highly apprehensive of imperilling their party prospects. As a result of this hesitant policy the leaders entered on the election campaign of 1885 with programmes which either did not include any references to Ireland or which contained only oblique references. Gladstone himself used non-committal phraseology. He contended that Ireland should have as much self-government as was consistent with the integrity of the 'United Kingdom'. During the election campaign, but too late to affect it, it was rumoured that he accepted the principle of a national legislature for Ireland. The main heads of his election address covered subjects of a domestic nature, such as local government and registration; and the majority of the Liberals took this programme as their election guide. Gladstone, displaying his more democratic mood, concluded his address: 'The work is ready, the workmen are ready, and only await the mandate of the constituencies to proceed with it.' He did not, however, as far as any one could tell, mean that the work of granting Home Rule for Ireland was ready. The section of his election address which dealt with Ireland did not suggest that he had anything more in his mind than improvements in the arrangements of local government.¹ The central passage in this section ran as follows:

'To maintain the supremacy of the Crown, the unity of the Empire, and all the authority of Parliament necessary for the conservation of that unity, is the first duty of every representative of the people. Subject to this governing principle, every grant to portions of the country of enlarged powers for the management of their own affairs is, in my view, not a source of danger, but a means of averting it, and is in the nature of a new guarantee for increased cohesion, happiness, and strength.'

¹ Gladstone, in the following year, published a denial that the only indication given by him of proposed changes was in respect of local government. See W. E. Gladstone, The Irish Question, p. 20.

It will be noticed that he merely mentioned the grant of enlarged powers to 'portions of the country'.

The election of 1885 was, so far as England and Scotland were concerned, fought in many constituencies on the rival programmes of social amelioration; Lord Randolph Churchill's Conservative democracy, Joseph Chamberlain's Radical proposals, and Jesse Collings's 'three acres and a cow', specially designed for the new rural electorate, all played a considerable part in the campaign. In some quarters the old cry of 'Church versus Dissent' also occupied a prominent place. But the voice of Gladstone was undoubtedly heard more clearly than any other.

By the time Gladstone had become Prime Minister, a few days after the reassembly of Parliament, his conversion to the necessity of Home Rule had become generally known; and, as a consequence, Lord Hartington, among other Liberals, refused to join his Ministry. As soon as Gladstone brought his Home Rule proposals before the House of Commons Lord Hartington charged him with fighting the recent election under false pretences, of having gained seats which would have been lost if Home Rule had been included in the programme, and, finally, of proposing to introduce a measure of the first importance without informing the electorate.

In regard to the last of these counts, Lord Hartington thus addressed the House of Commons:

'I am perfectly aware that there exists in our Constitution no principle of the mandate. I know that the mandate of the constituencies is as unknown to our Constitution as the distinction between fundamental laws and laws which are of inferior sanction. But, although no principle of mandate may exist, I maintain that there are certain limits which Parliament is morally bound to observe, and beyond which Parliament has morally not got the right to go in its relations with the constituents. The constituents of Great Britain are the source of power, at all events in this branch of Parliament; and I maintain that, in the presence of an emergency which could not have been foreseen, the House of Commons has no more right to initiate legislation, especially immediately upon its first meeting, of which the constituencies were not informed, and as to which,

if they had been so informed, there is, at all events, the very greatest doubt as to what their decision might be.'¹

Lord Hartington was naturally averse to admitting a principle by a name, like that of mandate, which, besides having a flavour of continental republicanism, was contrary to the traditional tenets of most Liberals. But it would be difficult to find any other single term by which to describe the obligations which he mentioned as being due to the electorate. As time went on and the contest over Home Rule developed, his views seem to have become more advanced. In 1893, as the Duke of Devonshire, he contended, in the debate on the second reading of the Government of Ireland Bill, that not merely the general issue of Home Rule, but also the form of the measure should be submitted to the people. He denied that the House of Commons had received 'any mandate upon Home Rule', and he asserted that the proposed measure should be submitted to the people for their approval before being passed into law.²

The reply which Gladstone made to Lord Hartington's strictures after the election of 1885 was extremely skilful in its combination of adherence to parliamentary authority with moderate recognition of democratic principles. He expressed himself as not being quite certain whether Lord Hartington meant that the Irish question should not be brought forward because it had not been referred to the people at the general election. 'It seems to me', he said, 'that this is an extraordinary doctrine. I want to know where it is laid down by any constitutional authority.' He proceeded to contend that, as there had been no mandate for a policy of Irish coercion, no mandate was needed for the grant of self-government.

'If', he argued, 'you do not want a mandate for the measures of force and repression, intended to maintain the law, much less do you want a mandate for measures intended to maintain and strengthen the law by laying hold of the hearts of the people, and which aim at no force and no repression, but at a union far closer and more durable than that which now exists on the Statute Book.'

This argument amounted to a repudiation of the necessity of obtaining the concurrence of the people to proposals which were admittedly of constitutional importance. It could hardly be a plea, such as had been raised on some earlier occasions, that so great urgency prevailed that an appeal to the people was inopportune.

¹ 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1241-4.

² 17 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 30-1.

In several speeches of about this time Gladstone resorted to the citation of precedent—an expedient of doubtful validity in periods in which new constitutional conventions are rapidly developing. The instance with which he chose on this occasion to enforce his denial of the necessity for a mandate was not a very convincing one. He pointed out that, in spite of the fact that Reform was not an issue in the election of 1830, Lord Grey's Ministry introduced its Reform Bill a few months after taking office, when, as Gladstone said, it was realized that the country was demanding Reform. It must have been a moving spectacle to watch the aged statesman recalling, as he did, the circumstances of an election which had taken place fifty-six years before. But he seems to have failed to measure the contrast between the circumstances of the autumn of 1830, when the whole country was roused to a pitch of extreme excitement over its demands for Reform, and those of the spring of 1886, when it could not be pretended that the people of England and Scotland were overwhelmingly enthusiastic for the cause of Home Rule. Moreover, as has already been remarked, it was not until the year 1831 that the principle of the mandate became definitely established. It was hardly pertinent, therefore, for Gladstone to argue by reference to events which occurred before that date.

His arguments do not strike the reader of the present day as persuasive; nor were the principles which he expounded those of a whole-hearted democratic leader. But he wisely included an observation, to the effect that the members of his Ministry would be the last persons who would object to referring the question of Home Rule to the people.¹ It was a true instinct that prompted this remark, since, two months later, his Home Rule Bill was defeated in the House of Commons by a majority of thirty.

When Gladstone dissolved—for he regarded resignation as 'showing the white feather'—he did not display the least hesitation respecting the propriety of referring the issue to the people. Indeed, it was only natural that, when the election had become inevitable, he should view the electorate from a different angle to that of a Minister with a hopeful majority in Parliament. He described the dissolution as 'the people's dissolution' on the analogy of the description of the battle of Inkerman as the soldiers' battle. In a speech at Edinburgh, in the course of the new election campaign, he asked what was the true issue which the people were called upon to decide. And he told his hearers that the question which they were to decide in the affirmative or in the negative was the proposition for the establishment of a legislative body in Ireland for the management of exclusively Irish affairs.¹

¹ 304 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1547.

§ 4. 1903-1911

Although it may be said that, in general, the Conservatives have been more disposed to magnify the power of the people in regard to policy than the Liberals, circumstances have continued to conspire to make it difficult for politicians of both parties to maintain a consistent attitude in respect of the principle of mandate. The two political questions which may be chosen to illustrate the development of the subject in the present century are that concerned with the tariff reform proposals of 1903-6 and that concerned with the conflict between the House of Commons and the House of Lords between 1907 and 1911. Remarks on these two phases will enable some comparison to be made between the attitudes of the two parties in and out of office.

Whereas the 'khaki' election of 1900 was alleged by the Liberal Opposition to have had but a single result, namely to enable the Conservatives to take the necessary steps to conclude the South African War, the Conservatives repudiated this allegation. When the Ministry proceeded to pass the Education Act of 1902 the Liberals contended that its mandate had been exceeded.

In May of the next year Joseph Chamberlain electrified the country by suddenly announcing his proposals for colonial preference. Balfour, the Prime Minister, wished to give mild, but non-committal, support to the newly raised project, and at the same time to keep it in suspense, since he saw that precipitate action was bound to imperil the prospects of his party by causing serious divisions of opinion. Nevertheless, Chamberlain, although he remained friendly to the Government, resigned in September 1903; and a few Conservative free-traders, apprehensive of the maintenance of their principles, adopted the same course.

¹ Speeches of W. E. Gladstone, vol. ix (1886-8), pp. 128, 133, 134. See also the terms of the dissolution Speech, quoted on p. 286 below.

During the next two and a half years, those, that is to say, between the announcement of Chamberlain's policy and the resignation of the Conservative Ministry, Balfour used every possible device to avoid the forcing of the issue. The Liberals, on the other hand, scenting the prospects of a Conservative defeat in a cry of 'dearer food', did all they could to press Balfour not only to formulate definite proposals for tariff reform, but even to undertake a measure. They conveniently forgot their earlier protests about the limited character of the mandate which had been obtained by the Conservatives at the last election.

Chamberlain, in making his famous Birmingham speech on 15 May 1903, in which he announced his new proposals, observed that the people would have to be consulted before such a momentous change in fiscal policy could be introduced. 'I think', he confidently stated, 'that our opponents may, perhaps, find that the issues which they propose to raise are not the issues on which we shall take the opinion of the country.' On 28 May 1903 the new fiscal question was first discussed in the House of Commons. Balfour found it impossible to declare that the people were ready to accept a tax on food; and, when pressed by Mr. Lloyd George, he undertook that his Ministry would not deal with the question without first putting it to the country at a general election. In the same debate Chamberlain plainly declared that there would have to be 'a new mandate given to the Government, if the suggestions which I have thrown out are to be carried into practical effect'; and he added that he would do everything in his power to bring the question in all its bearings before the people.¹

In March 1904 Balfour, acting consistently with his earlier attitude, denied that the fiscal question would be dealt with in the current Parliament. The Liberals tried to manoeuvre so that Chamberlain's proposals should be introduced in Parliament; and Balfour maintained that he could not proceed with them because, among other reasons, he had no mandate from the people to do so. He agreed with Asquith that 'as a legal proposition' it was not necessary to submit legislative measures to the electorate; but he did not agree that it would be within 'the limits of constitutional propriety, as distinguished from constitutional law' to introduce 'a great and fundamental change' such as that involved in the policy dealing with 'dumping' without previously submitting it as an issue at a general election.¹

¹ 123 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 178.

Later in 1904 Balfour announced that he proposed that the fiscal question should be discussed at a future date in conference with the Colonies, but only after a dissolution had first taken place. He further proposed that the fiscal reforms should not be introduced, even if the conference should prove that they were desirable, until after the holding of a second general election. The Liberals began to see that the prospect of the question being fought out in Parliament was remote; and they pressed for its submission to the people. At the beginning of the session of 1905 Campbell-Bannerman said that the country was waiting with impatience for an opportunity of expressing its judgement; and Asquith formally proposed that, 'the various aspects of the fiscal question having now been fully discussed in the country for nearly two years, the time has come for submitting the issue to the people without further delay'. Mr. Austen Chamberlain indignantly denied that, when a question had been sufficiently discussed, it was necessary to take the immediate decision of the country. This, he said, was a doctrine which would only be developed by an Opposition; and Joseph Chamberlain did not then press for an immediate election, though he had stated, shortly before, that the sooner the matter was referred to the people the better he would be pleased.²

Towards the end of 1905 Joseph Chamberlain's loyal restraint broke loose; and he demanded dissolution at the earliest possible moment. Balfour's difficulties became irresistible. They would have brought matters to a crisis long before in the person of a less resourceful and, perhaps, more resolute and far-seeing politician. The period of Parliament was running out; and he resigned, leaving to the Liberals the chief burden of framing the issues for reference to the electorate.

In this protracted episode the principle of mandate was largely accepted by both parties. The Liberals felt encouraged to support the principle, because they considered that the raising of an issue of 'dearer food' would bring them into power. The Conservatives had good reason to accept the principle, because they had no desire to precipitate the issue; and they were able to delay a dissolution for a considerable time. On both sides, however, it was, for the most part, genuinely admitted that a fiscal change of such a cardinal character, and one so closely affecting the lives of the people as that suggested by Joseph Chamberlain, could not be undertaken without the clear approval of the sovereign electorate.

¹ 191 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 678-9.

² 141 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 121-2, 190, 194, 338.

After the overwhelming Liberal victory of 1906 the question of free trade versus protection was soon laid on one side. The election left no doubt on that score. But, before proceeding to their legislative programme, the Liberals carried a motion in the House of Commons by the huge majority of 474 to 98 to the effect

‘that this House, recognizing that in the recent general election the people of the United Kingdom have demonstrated their unqualified fidelity to the principle and practice of Free Trade, deem it right to record its determination to resist any proposal . . . to create in this country a system of Protection’.

In this way the fiscal problem passed out of the arena of politics for several years, not without having elicited a valedictory affirmation of the principle of the mandate.

The lines of development of the people's part in politics took quite a different turn as a result of the election of 1906. The Liberals had, indeed, a very large majority in the House of Commons; but in the House of Lords they were in a proportionately small minority. Several of their important legislative measures were thrown out by the House of Lords; and they were placed in the ignominious position of being told that, as guardians of the rights of the people, the members of the Upper House must give the people an opportunity of pronouncing upon legislation, which, in their view, was inconsistent with public opinion. This was not an altogether new experience for the Liberals. The House of Lords had adopted a similar attitude on earlier occasions, when the Conservatives had been out of office. Lord Salisbury had, as has been seen, taken the view in 1872 that the House of Lords was entitled to maintain its objection to Bills passed by the House of Commons until ‘the judgment of the nation has been challenged at the polls and decidedly expressed’;¹ and he had also asserted the duty of the House of Lords to act as the people's guardian in 1884.

After the rejection by the House of Lords of the Education

¹ Lady Gwendolen Cecil, Life of Marquess of Salisbury, vol. ii, p. 26.

Bill and the Plural Voting Bill, the Liberal Prime Minister (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman) moved in the House of Commons, in June 1907,

‘that, in order to give effect to the will of the people as expressed by their elected representatives, it is necessary that the power of the other House to alter or reject Bills passed by this House should be so restricted by law as to secure that, within the limits of a single Parliament, the final decision of the Commons shall prevail’.

The debate on this motion respecting the relations between the Houses threw considerable light on current views regarding the relations between Parliament and the electorate. On the one hand, the Liberals contended that the House of Commons was given for the period of a Parliament a general mandate to enact such legislation as it chose. On the other hand, the Conservatives held that, if the House of Lords was not satisfied that an important measure had the support of the electorate, it was entitled to reject it. Very little was said of the intermediate view that a Ministry received, as a result of a general election, a mandate to enact any legislation which was consistent with the voting on such issues as were raised at that election or which was not both new in character and of constitutional importance.

The terms of the speech of Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman on this occasion illustrate the divergency between the views of the two parties.

‘The supremacy of the people in legislation implies,’ he said, ‘in this country at any rate, the authority of the Commons. The party for which I speak has never swerved from that position, and, unless you are going to fall back on some foreign method, such as the referendum or the mandate or the plebiscite, or some other way of getting behind the backs of the elected to the electors themselves, such as was advised by both the first and third Napoleon . . ., then there is no course open but to recognize ungrudgingly the authority which resides in this House, and to accept the views of the nation as represented in its great interests within these walls.’

If the Prime Minister had claimed somewhat less, if he had not claimed so extensive a competence during the period of Parliament, his contentions would have been difficult to refute. He would, it seems, have done better to have confined himself to an allegation that, in the particular instance under discussion, the authority obtained at the preceding election was sufficiently wide to cover the legislation which the House of Lords had rejected. If he intended to allege, as seems likely, that it is not possible or proper to refer a particular issue to the electorate, this view conflicts strangely with his clamorous insistence in 1905 for giving the people 'an opportunity of expressing judgment on the fiscal question'.

Most of Campbell-Bannerman's opponents contented themselves with reinforcing the demand that there should be an appeal to the people. But a great constitutionalist in the Conservative ranks, Sir William Anson, seized upon the weak point in the Prime Minister's argument. He emphasized the implication of the Liberal proposition, namely that, when once elected, the House of Commons could do whatever it liked, and that the people should be powerless for the whole of a period of a Parliament, however unexpected and egregious might be the policy which a Ministry was about to undertake.¹

It is fair to observe that Campbell-Bannerman, like Morley and one or two other Liberals of the old school, maintained fairly consistently that there was no such doctrine as that of mandate. When the Conservatives declared in 1900 that a dissolution was necessary in order to obtain the mandate of the people for the bringing of the South African War to a conclusion, he characterized their explanation as a mere excuse and stated his mistrust of special mandates, which he described as alien to the British Constitution.²

The same kind of deadlock occurred in 1909 over the Budget, which certainly contained provisions that gave Conservative members of the House of Lords some ground for distinguishing it from the normal Finance Bill. It was contended that, although there was considerable evidence to support the view that legislation imposing taxation should not be amended or even simply rejected by the Upper House, the Finance Bill of 1909 contained, under cover of financial provisions, general legislation of a new and fundamental character. It was thought, therefore, that a favourable opportunity had arisen to express a solicitude for the rights and interests of the electorate by rejecting the Bill. The Marquess of Lansdowne, on behalf of the Conservative party in the House of Lords, moved an amendment to the motion that the Bill be read a second time, to the effect 'that this House is not justified in giving its consent to this Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country'. This amendment was adopted by a large majority in the House of Lords.

¹ 176 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 911, 918-20, 1902.

² Address to the electors of Stirling Burghs, Sept. 1900; see The Times, 22 Sept. 1900.

The arguments of the mover were simple and straightforward. The Bill, he said, with its important provisions had 'never been before the people of this country'. He did not think that the House of Lords should undertake the responsibility of giving its concurrence until it was satisfied that the people desired that the Bill should become law. The Upper House should, he contended, adopt the position of guardian of the people's constitutional right to be consulted when fundamental political changes were demanded by the Government of the day. Lord Morley, on behalf of the Government, maintained the precise converse of the attitude of Sir William Anson in the debate of 1907. Whereas Anson had complained that the Liberals were claiming full power for the House of Commons during the period of a Parliament, Morley complained that a Conservative House of Lords was attempting to cut down the normal period of Parliament, which should continue without interruption for another two or three years. He entirely neglected the question, whether or not new proposals of constitutional importance justified a break in the normal period of Parliament in order that such proposals might be submitted to the people.

The debate produced an interesting difference of opinion between Lord Curzon and Lord Courtney of Penwith respecting the distinction between the right of the House of Lords merely to reject Bills and the right to force an appeal to the people. Lord Curzon took the view that it was 'inherent in the rights of any Second Chamber' to 'compel a reference to the polls' in a case where the Government of the day introduced a measure which was either 'in flagrant conflict with the expressed will of the nation' or had never been submitted to and approved by the people. Lord Courtney, who had a considerable reputation as a constitutional authority, held on the contrary that, although the House of Lords had the right to reject Bills, it had not the right to force a dissolution and reference to the country.

'You may, for example,' he said, 'reject an Education Bill, or an Irish Land Bill, and Parliament . . . may go on for two or three years . . . but in rejecting the Finance Bill, as you will do, you compel at once an appeal to the country, and thus you are acting in a manner for which no precedent can be cited, in a manner which has never been attempted even by the boldest advocate of the rights of your Lordships in past times.'

Lord Courtney's reliance on the absence of precedent does not appear to be convincing, since the responsibilities of the House of Lords in relation to the people could only be judged according to standards which had grown up since the mandate principle had become generally acknowledged; and this period was not extensive enough to permit of the application of precedents.¹

Lord Lansdowne's arguments in favour of his motion were generally approved by the Conservative party at the time of this debate; but, in the retrospect of after-years, many members of the party felt that the disaster, as it seemed to them, of the passing of the Parliament Act, 1911 (which limited the powers of the House of Lords), was mainly attributable to the rejection of the Finance Bill in 1909. It is easy to advance broad principles regarding the necessity for popular approval of novel and important proposals; but it is a delicate matter for a hereditary House to determine which proposals fall within these principles.

The deadlock between the two Houses, arising out of the rejection of the Finance Bill in 1909, was chiefly responsible for the necessity of two general elections in 1910; and a considerable amount of argument ensued regarding the nature and extent of the mandate which was obtained on these occasions. Most of the discussion in Parliament centred round the question whether the people had given a mandate for the passing of the Parliament Bill of 1911. The subject of Lords versus People was one of those raised in the election of January 1910; and, prior to the election of December 1910, the Ministry issued the terms of its proposed Parliament Bill, limiting the powers of the House of Lords to reject legislation. Proposals for constitutional reform had already been mooted by the Conservatives; but there had been no debate on the Liberals' concrete proposals prior to the dissolution in November 1910. The result of this second election was much the same as that of the first, namely to give the Liberals a majority consisting of little more than the

¹ 4 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 731 ff., 1139, 1260, 1266, 1345.

Irish members, who supported the Liberals in the hope of securing a measure enacting Home Rule.

When the Parliament Bill came to be debated in both Houses in the first half of 1911, there was, as might be expected, a complete disagreement between the parties on the question whether the second election of 1910 had given the Liberals a mandate to pass the Bill in the terms made public prior to the election. Asquith, the Prime Minister, asserted that his Ministry had a mandate to pass the Bill more or less in the form which had been published.

'If ever', he said, 'there was anything approaching the nature of a referendum, it was the general election of December of last year. . . . As every one knows, at that election this Bill, preamble and clauses, was submitted to the electors for their approval or disapproval as the case might be.'

And the Lord Chancellor (Loreburn) maintained that the Bill was made 'the main and crucial point . . . at the general election by both sides'. So also Lord Haldane, who said that there had been as true a referendum as any one could wish to see, since the propositions of the Bill had been specifically submitted to the country; 'line for line they were made the predominant feature at the last election'. Lord Morley pointed out that the Marquess of Lansdowne had propounded an alternative scheme on behalf of the Conservatives and that the electors had rejected the alternative scheme and accepted the Parliament Bill. On this occasion, it is to be noted, all the Liberals admitted the existence of the mandate principle.

On the other side, the Conservatives denied the existence of anything like a definite mandate for the Bill. Balfour allowed that, in December 1910, the people had shown themselves desirous of dealing 'with what is called the constitutional question'. But that 'they actually gave the Government a mandate for this particular way of dealing with it, I do not believe in the least'. They merely, he said, were resolved that there should be some amendment of the relations between the two Houses; and he characterized as absurd the suggestion that they could be in a position to form an opinion on the terms of the Bill, in the absence of a previous discussion of them in the House of Commons. He contended that any allegation 'that the people had clearly this issue and in the main only this issue before them, is a complete and absolute travesty of the notorious facts of the situation'. Both Lord Curzon and Sir William Anson also argued that the people had not a sufficient opportunity of considering the terms of the Bill, that the Conservatives had not had time before the election to criticize it, and that the issues of December 1910 were far from plain and straightforward. These contentions almost amount to the requirement of two general elections before an authentic mandate can be obtained from the people. At the first general election the principle underlying the proposed legislation must be approved. At the second general election the terms of the proposed legislation must be submitted after the principle of it had been debated and discussed. To expect this procedure is to render the principle of mandate, if not absurd, at least impracticable.¹

No better illustration than the debates of 1911 could be found of unqualified admissions by both parties of the principle of mandate and, at the same time, a complete disagreement regarding its effect. It should, however, be added that the Conservatives, although basing their arguments to a certain extent on the nature of the issues, were also able to allege with some force that, if the voting strength of the Irish members had been eliminated, the Liberals would have obtained no real majority at the elections of 1910, so as to justify a claim for a mandate of any kind.

The ability and responsibility of the House of Lords to act as guardians of the people's interests, although limited as a result of the provisions of the Parliament Act, still continues; and this was recognized in the Bryce Report on the Reform of the Second Chamber (1918). It was assumed that one of the chief functions of the House of Lords was to enable the opinion of the people to be taken on subjects which were considered to be of fundamental importance and which had not been previously submitted to them. But the fact that the House exercises this function with a high degree of restraint may be attributable in part to its experiences in the years 1909 to 1911.

The difficulty of tracing obvious lines of development in the history of the mandate principle during the last century has been seen to be largely due to the influence of political expediency. On occasion a statesman like Peel, who was constitutionally indisposed to encourage the intervention of the people in matters of government, was forced, as in 1834, to admit the people's ability to decide on the choice of Ministries or the adoption of policies. And a statesman like Gladstone, who had many of the qualities of a democrat, was unable, in some of the many circumstances which he had to face, to admit the people to the fullest capacity which was claimed for them. Throughout the last hundred years, however, the succeeding measures for widening the franchise tended more and more to induce politicians to accept the principle of popular mandate; and at the present day universal, or virtually universal, suffrage has made the attitude of the old Liberals like Morley impossible, or at least inadvisable, to maintain. No Minister who is charged in Parliament with being unfortified with the mandate of the people would dare nowadays to assert that Parliament is competent to pass whatever legislation it pleases, regardless of the necessity of obtaining popular approval.

¹ 8 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 678, 762; 9 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 442, 573, 820, 1005; 24 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1055, 1056, 1089, 1111; 25 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1602 1701-2.

Since the stage when expediency was apt to determine whether the principle of the mandate should be admitted or not, opportunism has too often influenced both the occasions on which the principle has been applied and the results of its application. Circumstances, which were to some extent avoidable, have prevented several of the elections of the twentieth century from having as much of the effect of the referendum as they might have had. The character of the issues and the times at which they have been raised have frequently been affected by the narrower considerations of party. Issues have been emphasized or ignored from this point of view rather than from that of public interest. Moreover, claims to the existence of a popular mandate have been discussed in the period subsequent to general elections, with an undue amount of bias. But, after the experience of the drawbacks and ambiguities which are attributable to such reasons as these, it may be hoped that there is a prospect of the principle of mandate developing on broader and more useful lines. It rests with public opinion to bring about the required improvement.

In this and the preceding chapter nothing more has been attempted than a sketch of a few outstanding incidents in the progress of the political capacity of the people. Some light may be thrown on the problems raised by the application of the principle of mandate by a more analytical treatment of the subject. It is proposed, therefore, to pay attention in the following chapters to the various classes of issues which have been raised at general elections, the proper occasions for raising them, and the manner in which they have been raised.

CHAPTER X

THE ISSUES

§ 1. Verdicts on the past

PERHAPS the most obvious division of the kinds of issues which can be submitted to the people is that which separates them into those that relate to the past rather than the future and those that relate to the future rather than to the past. And yet, in some sense, all issues must look to the future. When it is said that the people give verdicts on the past, it is meant that the choice of Ministers is based more on the records of past administration than on proposals for the future. In the early history of the people's part in government, political discussions at election time tended to turn on past administration. Nowadays the electors are less confined than they were to personal considerations; and they are commonly given the opportunity of declaring their views upon the future policies as well as on the past records of the parties.

As has already been remarked, some rudimentary notions of a decision by the people on future policy were spread abroad as early as the reigns of William III and Anne, although it was not then seriously expected that the people's preferences would necessarily be adopted. The habitual submission of prospective issues naturally came later than that of issues dealing with the past. An excellent reason for the lack of control over future activities was the absence of any recognized obligation on the part of Ministries to produce legislative programmes. The ascertained future policy of a Ministry was chiefly confined to such matters as war and diplomacy. The anti-French policy of William III, which was the central feature of the election of 1701, provides an example of this type of issue; but such examples were isolated; and it was not until after 1832 that prospective issues became general, as a result of the acceptance of the obligation to produce party programmes.

Nor was there, at the time of William III and Anne, anything more than a vague foreshadowing of the ability of the electorate to give judgement on the past record of the Ministry in office. Reflections on the character and efficiency of Ministers were intended to influence particular contests; but no determinative effect from the total results of the returns was anticipated, since the unfettered power of the Sovereign to settle the constitution of Ministries was still unquestioned. The Tories, for instance, in the first election of the reign of Anne were feverishly anxious to regain the ground which they had lost to the Whigs in the anti-French election of the previous year. 'The electors were asked to reflect who had voted for a standing army, who had obstructed the commissioners for public accounts, who "signed treaties for the dishonour of England", who delivered up the right of impeachment, and who had put fortunes in their pockets.'¹ But the turn-over of votes in favour of the Tories which occurred at the election did not involve the appointment of an all-Tory Ministry. The indictment of the last Ministry of William III in the election campaign was not expected to do much more than ensure that the electors should recognize the candidates who had supported the alleged delinquencies.

So also in the elections of 1713 and 1715; although the Commercial Treaty and the Treaty of Utrecht respectively were criticized by the Whigs, it was rather the Parliament than the Ministry which was denounced. Inquiry was promoted regarding those responsible for alleged maladministration; but it would have been premature to have maintained that the Tory Ministry stood condemned as the result of the voting at the general election of 1715.

Robert Walpole, who was at that time enhancing the importance of the new position of leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, wrote an election tract in 1713 which, while dealing with the history of the two or three preceding years, reflected rather upon the reputation of the Tory party than upon that of the Ministry. The Ministry consisted of the servants of the Sovereign; and criticism of them, as such, had necessarily to be indirect. 'I think it a piece of justice,' Walpole ironically remarked, 'due to them [the Parliament], to those that chose them and to those who are soon to proceed to a new election, to give a short sketch of their most extraordinary transactions.'²

The unequal condition of the parties and the growth of corruption in politics after the accession of the Hanoverians left the submission of issues at a standstill. The Tories attempted, with but small effect, to make the enactment of the Septennial Act of 1715 an issue in the election of 1722. They charged the Whigs with the intention of constituting themselves into a 'Long Parliament', and they revived the name of 'Rump', so as to awaken the sentiments of the preceding century. But the hopelessness of their endeavour materially to strengthen their position in Parliament left little room for the possibility of a declaration by the people on the merits of the Act. The situation was only a little more hopeful when the Opposition attempted the disparagement of Walpole's Excise Scheme in the election of 1734, though the idea of the election being a 'trial' of the Ministry was beginning to be understood.¹

¹ K. Feiling, History of the Tory Party, p. 365.

² A Short History of the Parliament (1713).

Some signs of a judgement on the past became noticeable when Walpole's resignation was forced upon him shortly after the election of 1741;² but it was not until considerably later that any approach to retrospective issues in the modern sense was recognizable.

After 1832 it was frequently the practice to submit to the judgement of the people the propriety of past policy. Peel, in the election of 1847, endeavoured to justify to the electorate his financial policy of the preceding year. Further examples will present themselves, when the problems raised by the concurrence of prospective and retrospective issues in modern times are discussed.

§ 2. Men and measures

The slogans 'not men but measures' and 'men, not measures' have had a long history; but it is only during the last century that they have indicated partialities for issues regarding the future and issues regarding the past respectively. Before that period they were used in support of alternative principles on which Ministries might be formed. 'Measures' were preferred to 'men' in the eighteenth century chiefly owing to a distrust or dislike of party methods and sectional interests. This was the feeling which led the elder Pitt to consider that Ministers should be selected for their ability to carry out a policy rather than for their party connexions. Burke, when he described 'the cant of not men, but measures' as 'a sort of charm by which many people get loose from every honourable engagement', obviously had Pitt in mind.

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 15th Report, Appendix, Part VI (Carlisle MSS.), p. 125, Sir Thomas Robinson to Lord Carlisle, 8 Dec. 1733. ² See pp. 105, 106 above.

'Men, not measures', interpreted in more modern sense, applied, that is to say, to election issues, epitomized the attitude of Tories like the Duke of Wellington when they saw the policy of Reform being submitted to the people in 1831. The Duke had no objection to the people choosing between rival Ministries; but for them to take a part in the determination of legislative policy appeared to him to endanger the stability of the Constitution. Like many others, he thought that the people, while able to judge of the suitability of their rulers, were neither able nor should be allowed to judge of the effect of prospective measures. In a debate in the House of Lords in October 1831 he drew a distinction between the personal character of the issues in the election of 1784 and the political ones in 1831.¹

On two or three occasions in the middle of the nineteenth century there were reversions to the notion, then becoming obsolete, that the mandate of the people was exclusively a personal one and had no relation to policy. And this was so, in spite of the fact that the business of government had undergone a vast change from that of a hundred years before. The contrast between the task of Ministers and the activities of Parliament in 1750 and in 1850 is evidenced by the contents of the statute-book. A volume of the Statutes at the earlier period contains a high proportion of legislation of a local and almost trivial character. But the Ministers of the Victorian period had large programmes of legislation to carry through, affecting the life of the nation in many different aspects.

The circumstances in which the discredited Liberals insisted on clinging to office in the spring of 1841, after they had been defeated on an important financial question, throw light on the hesitation with which any control of policy by the people came to be recognized. Peel argued that there were no precedents which would support the Liberals' retention of office, and that Pitt's refusal to resign or dissolve Parliament in 1784 was not a parallel case. In reply to these contentions, Lord John Russell quoted precedents going back to Queen Anne's reign for a defeated Ministry retaining office. He alleged that the Ministry needed merely to retain confidence in its administrative ability, and not necessarily confidence in respect of legislation; and he pointed out that, up to the time of Pitt, the Ministry was not expected to bring forward legislative measures.²

¹ 7 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1192; cf. pp. 201, 202 above. ² Cf. pp. 156, 157 above.

Peel himself, in 1846, displayed uncertainty regarding the admissibility of issues other than personal ones, when deliberating on the nature of the issue which he should place before the country at the ensuing election. 'On what ground shall we appeal to the country?' he asked. 'Surely not on the mere personal one, were we justified in proposing the Corn Bill? We must appeal to it on some principle. The natural one seems to be "Free Trade and the destruction of Protection".'¹ The Duke of Wellington, at Peel's request, considered these alternatives and recommended that the issue should be simply the one, whether Peel should continue to be Prime Minister or not.

When party ties are temporarily broken, the absence of agreed party programmes leaves personal issues as the only issues before the people. In the middle of the nineteenth century there was not only a derangement of party allegiances which was chiefly attributable to the separation of the Peelites from the Conservatives on the question of free trade, but the personal note was emphasized by the presence of a popular figure, Palmerston, who was capable both of holding Ministers together and of attracting a following in the country. It naturally happened that the question of his support tended to exclude all other issues.

After Palmerston had been defeated in the House of Commons in 1857, on a motion proposed by Cobden to the effect that the administration of the Palmerston Ministry in China had been too violent, Disraeli challenged him to stand by the Chinese issue and by a negation of the principle of further Reform. Although the challenge was accepted, the real issue in the ensuing election, as was appreciated by the people, was one of confidence in Palmerston, with the endorsement of the policy of the Crimean War in the background. Gladstone, who was at the time occupying an independent position in politics (he supported Cobden's motion), accurately described the situation as follows:

"This was not an election like that of 1784, when Pitt appealed on the question whether the Crown should be the slave of an oligarchic faction; nor like that of 1831, when Grey sought a judgment on reform; nor like that of 1852, when the issue was the expiring controversy of protection. The country was to decide not upon the Canton River [i.e. the Chinese question],

¹ Sir Robert Peel's Memoirs, vol. ii, p. 295.

but whether it would or would not have Palmerston for Prime Minister.' ¹

At the time of the defeat of the Derby-Disraeli Ministry on the question of Reform in 1859 the Conservative party was disunited. In view of the confused state of politics the Ministry felt justified in obtaining a dissolution, although the Parliament had only lasted two years. It did not desire to submit the question of Reform as an issue in the election. Other questions of policy, such as those respecting China, India, and Italy, were either settled or no longer in dispute. The issue proved to be a personal one between Palmerston and Russell on the one hand and Derby and Disraeli on the other. Derby, the Prime Minister, took pains to confine the contest to personal grounds in his statement in the House of Lords prior to the election. No appeal, he said, was made to the country on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. The question to be submitted was that of confidence or lack of confidence in Ministers. Disraeli, too, described the dissolution as involving an 'appeal to the country on our personal position'. ²

The Liberal party disapproved the unwillingness of the Conservatives to stand by the subject of their defeat or even to state what it pleased to describe as the 'forensic issue'. On the assembly of the new Parliament Palmerston expressed this disapproval; and he thus defined the issues in the election:

'We have had an appeal to the country. It was not upon the Reform Bill; it was not upon one measure or another, it was simply an appeal to the country to determine whether the present Government does or does not possess the confidence of Parliament or of the people.' ³

It is interesting to remark that, immediately after Disraeli's announcement in the House of Commons of the impending dissolution, Palmerston had insisted that Reform would be the issue in the election in spite of anything which Disraeli might say to the contrary. His subsequent change of view, by which he described the issue as a personal one, is an illustration of the predominance of Ministries over Oppositions in regard to the submission of issues. It would not, perhaps, be so easy to-day for a Ministry to evade issues of policy and to deny that an important measure on which it was defeated, a measure proposed by it, was an issue in an election immediately following that defeat. A measure in respect of which a Ministry suffers a defeat, if a vital one, will, it may be supposed, generally become one of the main issues in an election precipitated by the failure to pass that measure.

¹ J. Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. i, p. 564.

² 153 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1289-91, 1307.

³ 154 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 182.

By 1865 Palmerston had become an idol of a large section of the community, and almost a national institution. When, therefore, he appealed to the people in that year, at the end of a Parliament which had lasted nearly its full period, he was not afraid of claiming a renewal of confidence in his administration without raising any particular positive policy. The man counted more than any question of measures. Even Bright's enthusiasm for Reform did not bring that subject into the position of an issue, though it was widely discussed in the constituencies. It was fully realized that the aged statesman ought not to be, indeed could not be, frustrated.

An even more obvious example of the ability of a politician with a forceful character to reduce issues to personal factors is that of Gladstone. His unfailing capacity, in his prime, to hold the political stage and monopolize the attention of the electorate aroused such a lively antagonism as almost to suggest that he was aiming at the role of dictator. Randolph Churchill criticized Gladstone's part in the election of 1886 in a bitter tirade; but a recollection of the ways of Palmerston renders a charge of novelty in this respect against Gladstone untenable, for Palmerston concentrated an interest in and appealed for confidence in himself as much as he did for confidence in his Ministry or his policy. Gladstone, wrote Randolph Churchill in his most trenchant manner,

'demands a vote of confidence from the constituencies. Confidence in what? In the Liberal party? No! The Liberal party, as we know it, exists no longer. In his Irish project? No! It is dead; to be resuscitated or not, either wholly or in part, just as may suit the personal convenience of the author. In his Government? No! They are a mere collection of "items", whom he does not condescend to consult. In himself? Yes! This is the latest and most perilous innovation into constitutional practices. A pure unadulterated personal plebiscite, that is the demand; a political expedient borrowed from the last and worst days of the second Empire.'¹

¹ Winston Churchill, Life of Lord Randolph Churchill, vol. ii, p. 495.

Exaggerated as is this description of Gladstone's attitude in the election of 1886, it has in it a certain element of truth. Emphasis on personal factors is the almost inevitable sequel to the disorganization of party allegiances. Just as questions of policy were eclipsed in the Palmerston period, largely as a result of the derangement of the party system, so, to a less extent, were they under Gladstone after the Liberal party had been split in two through the introduction of proposals for Home Rule.

During normal party government in England, 'measures' generally arouse a larger interest among the people than 'men'; and it is only when the party system breaks down or where a politician of exceptional personal authority comes into the political arena (or a combination of both situations) that issues of 'men' become of greater importance than those of 'measures'. But confusion is bound to arise when the two kinds of issue are about equally in evidence. If the issue of 'men' is the more impressive, the people may seem to vote against measures to which they have no objection; or, if the issue of 'measures' is predominant, they may seem to vote against a man whom they would willingly see in power.

In the United States of America the people's concern in the choice of the President often emphasizes the personal rather than the political nature of the issues. The President is chosen as much for his ability and experience as for his adherence to the tenets of one of the great parties. Whether, in any given presidential election, the personal or party issue is the more conspicuous depends, as Bryce has observed, 'partly on the political questions which happen to be then before the people, partly on the more or less marked individuality of the rival candidates; . . . when political controversy is languid, personal issues come to the front'.¹

The circumstances of the election in the United States following on the conclusion of the War of 1914-18 have been quoted as an instance of the misunderstandings that may arise as a result of the co-existence of personal and party issues. Very considerable personal opposition was exhibited towards President Wilson as a result of his negotiations respecting the League of Nations. The people were, it seems, determined to rid themselves of a Democratic administration and to secure a Republican one. They were much more interested in the personal issue than in the issue of the League which was advanced by the Democrats. In consequence, it was generally assumed, but, as retrospective reflection suggests, with doubtful reason, that the voice of the people had declared itself against the policy of joining the League of Nations. Probably the overwhelming Republican victory meant no more than that they disliked the Democratic administration, and that they would have elected a Republican candidate whatever the issues had been.

¹ J. Bryce, American Commonwealth, 3rd ed. (American), vol. ii, pp. 212-215.

§ 3. Mixed issues and party tactics

The passing of the great Reform Bill not only led to an increased capacity in the people to deal with election issues, but also, for that very reason, to a reorganization of parties and to new methods of conducting general election campaigns. It became the normal course for both parties to raise issues, a procedure which was capable of producing complications and ambiguity. The Ministry might rely on its own past record and appeal to the people on that score; it might raise the issue of proposed legislation; or it might do both. The Opposition might raise the issue of the Ministry's past record or of proposed legislation or both.

When several issues have been raised by both sides, the circumstances or the qualities of leading politicians have sometimes determined which of the issues should be the effective one. But there has been no certain means of ensuring that any particular issue was isolated and voted upon. Frequently the press has discussed, after an election was over, what was the prevailing issue; and on occasion only a very dubious conclusion has been reached. It is but seldom that the situation has been clearly defined at the opening of an election campaign.

A few illustrations will prove how uncertain and bewildering were the attitudes of parties at many elections. In that of 1837 the Liberal Ministry chiefly relied on its past record as promoters of the great Reform Bill, while the Conservative Opposition, not desiring to produce a positive programme of its own, tried to make the election turn on the dangers of the alleged possible legislation of a radical and subversive nature, which, it was suggested, might be undertaken if the Liberals obtained a majority. In 1841 a very different course was adopted. The Liberals, after a period of growing discredit, had been defeated in Parliament and were anxious to avoid raising the issue of their past administration. They preferred to emphasize the danger of the monopoly or protectionist proposals which they ascribed to the Conservative party. The Conservatives, on the other hand, maintained that the question for the people to try was not the merits of protection, but the question whether the Liberal Ministry, as a result of its past record, deserved the confidence of the people; and they published a catalogue of alleged examples of Ministerial mismanagement.

These two elections, of 1837 and 1841, provide a notable contrast. The former is an instance of a Ministry relying on its past record and the Opposition on the Ministry's supposed future measures; and the latter an instance of a Ministry avoiding its past record by bringing the anticipated projects of the Opposition into the limelight of the contest, while the Opposition insisted that the past record of the Ministry constituted the real issue. In the former instance the Ministry had the greater favour with the people and the effective issue seems to have been that chosen by it rather than that chosen by the Opposition; and in the latter instance the Opposition gained the people's ear, and the issue which it selected seems to have predominated.

As has been seen, the 'group' politics of the middle of the nineteenth century do not provide normal examples of election issues;¹ it is well, therefore, to pass over that period. In the election of 1874 similar tactics were practised to those just described. A Liberal Ministry, thoroughly discredited with the people, attempted, as it had done in 1841, to deflect attention from a judgement on its past administration by adverting to the future. On this occasion, however, Gladstone did not, and indeed hardly could, bring to the front any alleged inexpedient projects of the Conservatives, since the Conservatives were careful not to advance any very definite proposals. But he produced some tempting benefits which might be secured by future legislation, such as the repeal of the income-tax and reform of local taxation. Once again the Conservatives tried to exploit the discredit of the Liberals to the fullest extent. They were determined that the past record of the Ministry should be kept in prominence; and this proved to be the leading issue. Disraeli discoursed upon Gladstone's 'career of plundering and blundering',

¹ See p. 241 above.

'incessant and harassing legislation', and neglect of foreign policy. His own programme for the future was hazily outlined and not pressed forward. It consisted merely of general sentiments regarding the improvement of the condition of the people.

Other elections in the later part of the nineteenth century, while presenting some different features to those already portrayed, further illustrate the large part which party tactics have played in the discrimination between prospective and retrospective issues and in the direction given to election campaigns. Certain changes in method, which became apparent on the revival of the two-party system, are to a large extent attributable to the eager, active mind and forceful qualities of Gladstone, as exemplified in his advocacy of the disestablishment of the Irish Church and of Home Rule for Ireland.

When, in 1868, Disraeli had suffered the unusual experience of defeat on a legislative proposal brought forward by the leader of the Opposition (Gladstone), he was naturally desirous of avoiding the concentration of the electors' attention on that issue and of making the most of his own past policy. He spoke, in his address to his constituents, of the success achieved by the passing of the Reform Act of 1867, of his foreign policy, and his provisions for national defence. But he was unable to avoid the prospective issue of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, which the Liberals succeeded in forcing into the foreground. While Gladstone asserted that his proposals provided the solution of an urgent problem, Disraeli had to be content to adopt an attitude of negation, of 'uncompromising resistance' and alarm respecting the outcome of the policy, if adopted.

On several occasions the election tactics of the Conservatives consisted either in criticisms of the proposals or of the past record of the Liberals or in simple reliance on their past record. Expediency often restrained them from producing a positive programme. Disraeli himself seemed studiously to avoid explicit positive proposals in his election addresses. On the other hand, it was a necessary consequence of the Liberal creed for that party to be more constructive in its treatment of issues; and, once it had accepted Home Rule as part of its programme, this prospective issue inevitably dominated every other issue in a series of election contests.

In 1880 Home Rule had not yet been adopted as a 'plank' in the Liberal 'platform'; and the election of that year displayed characteristics which give it a singular place in the development of the submission of issues. The Liberals decided that, with the help of Gladstone's Midlothian orations, they could gain more by emphasizing the past delinquencies of the Beaconsfield Ministry than by producing positive proposals of their own. But the Conservatives, after a period of more than six years in office, feared the swing of the pendulum; and, at the instance of Beaconsfield, they endeavoured to make the trial between the parties depend on the supposed intentions of the Liberals regarding Home Rule.

The document which amounted to the election manifesto of Beaconsfield described Home Rule or the 'disintegration of the United Kingdom' as a 'destructive doctrine', and as 'a danger, in its ultimate results, scarcely less disastrous than pestilence and famine'. It did not contain any reference to proposals of the Conservatives, and it only included incidental justifications of the Ministry's past policy regarding Ireland and foreign affairs.

Gladstone, on the other hand, made a violent attack on the record of the Beaconsfield Ministry. Some months before the election he stated, in his first Midlothian speech at Edinburgh, that the past record of the Ministry would be the issue which the people would have to try at the ensuing election. He arraigned the administration in the following highly coloured phraseology:

'If faith has been broken, if blood has been needlessly shed, if the name of England has been discredited and lowered from that lofty standard which it ought to exhibit to the whole world, if the country has been needlessly distressed, if finance has been thrown into confusion, if the foundations of the Indian Empire have been impaired, all these things as yet are the work of an Administration and a Parliament; but the day is coming, and is near at hand, when that event will take place which will lead the historian to declare whether or not they are the work, not of an Administration and not of a Parliament, but the work of a great and free people. If this great and free and powerful people is disposed to associate itself with such transactions, if it is disposed to assume upon itself what some of us would call the guilt, and many of us must declare to be the heavy burden, of all those events that have been passing before our eyes, it rests with them to do it. . . . Gentlemen, this is the issue which the people of this country will have to try.'¹

¹ Speeches in Scotland by W. E. Gladstone, vol. i, pp. 57-8.

Nearly all Gladstone's efforts were devoted to arousing a revulsion of feeling against Conservative imperialism and an adventurous foreign policy. He did not make any considerable proposals for legislation, beyond one for the enlargement of the franchise in the counties, upon which his supporters were not at all enthusiastic.

It soon became clear to the Liberals that Beaconsfield did not intend to accept Gladstone's statement of the issues, but meant to avoid as far as possible all references to the past. Gladstone wrote, at the end of 1879, to Lord Granville: 'For several reasons I should believe that they intend sailing on the quiet tack. Having proved their spirit they will now prove their moderation. In other words, they want all the past proceedings to be, in the main, "stale fish" at the election.' When, however, he had read Beaconsfield's election manifesto, he saw that it was not merely proposed to avoid the past, but to avoid it by the novel process of laying emphasis on the presumed future policy of the Opposition. He immediately, in his fourth Midlothian speech at Edinburgh, objected, with much justification, to the stratagem of Beaconsfield. It was, he asserted, an entirely new departure to make the issue to be tried at a general election the merits of the Opposition rather than the merits of the Government. It had always been considered that it was the Government that should be exposed to criticism.¹

It was open to Gladstone, in 1880, to assert that neither he nor his party had officially adopted the principle of Home Rule; and the same can be said with almost equal correctness of the election of 1885. But, immediately after the latter election and in the elections of 1886 and 1892, Home Rule was definitely the main issue advanced by Gladstone and his supporters. When, therefore, the Conservative Ministry appealed to the people in 1892, the Liberals had no ground for complaining that the appeal was based, first, on the Conservatives' resistance to the Liberal Opposition's proposal for Home Rule, and, secondly, on their own record of work done. So long as an issue retains its hold upon the interest of the people, neither party can complain if its opponents make it the primary one for decision at the next general election. Gladstone himself did not complain. He kept Home Rule sternly in the forefront, and advanced the heterogeneous items of the Newcastle programme, which was dictated to him by the party convention, as issues of the second rank.

¹ Speeches in Scotland by W. E. Gladstone, vol. ii, pp. 21-2.

Enough has been said to provide some illustration of the extent to which party manœuvring affects the determination of issues. It has frequently happened that a Ministry has preferred to screen its exploits or absence of achievements behind its promises or projects for the future, or that an Opposition has felt more sanguine in relying on the unpopularity of a Ministry than in the proposal of new measures, the approbation of which by the people appeared to be questionable. In such ways as these the people have been deprived of necessary opportunities both of giving judgement on past administration and of expressing opinion on future policy.

§ 4. Prospective issues

In recent years there has been a tendency for all parties to include proposals for the future in their manifestoes, to the comparative exclusion of references to the past record of the Ministry. This tendency is, doubtless, to some extent due to a growing realization that there is a greater prospect of success in raising positive future issues than in justifications or criticisms of the past. And it is also to be explained as being the outcome of the increasing temptation, in view of the widening of the franchise, for all parties to place reliance on the electioneering value of promises of future benefits to the people. Even as early as the debates on the Reform Bill in 1831 Peel warned the House of Commons that, as a result of the increase in the number of voters, there would be an inclination on the part of members 'to gratify their constituents by popular measures'. This tendency first, perhaps, became noticeable shortly after the enlargement of the franchise effected by the Reform Act of 1867; but it was only after the Act of 1884, and to a still greater extent after the grant of almost universal suffrage in 1918 and 1929, that it became general.

When discussing the proposed terms of Disraeli's address for the election of 1868, Gathorne Hardy ventured to suggest that it might be well for Disraeli to include some promise of the introduction of a measure of social amelioration.¹ And in 1874 Gladstone endeavoured to improve the chances of his party at the polls by promising to repeal the income-tax, to diminish local taxation, and to give relief to the general public in respect of articles of popular consumption. Disraeli replied that these were 'measures which the Conservative party have always favoured and which the Prime Minister and his friends have always opposed'. Moreover, he maintained that the improvement of the condition of the people had been for many years his constant aim.

¹ Gathorne Hardy, First Earl of Cranbrook, A Memoir, vol. i, p. 282.

After the Liberals came into power in 1906 the amount of legislation conferring benefits on large sections of the community showed a remarkable increase; and there were not lacking those who accused the Ministry of bribing the electorate. Lord Rosebery, for instance, at the time when the extent of the mandate obtained for passing the Parliament Bill of 1911 was under discussion, alleged that the authority of the two elections of 1910 was impaired as a result of the bribe offered to the electorate by the allowance of old-age pensions.¹

At the end of the War of 1914-18, and after the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, from which there followed the biggest increase in the suffrage ever made in this country, all parties vied with each other in producing schemes for settling the country into prosperous peace conditions. When the Coalition Ministry, which had ruled in the later part of the war and for a short time after the conclusion of peace, went out of office, Bonar Law, as Prime Minister, described for the purpose of the election of 1922 his proposed measures, which were intentionally limited and unambitious. Mr. Lloyd George advocated co-operation, the League of Nations, and economy; and the independent Liberals and the Labour party both had their programmes. The situation in 1923 was a little different. Though again all parties had prospective measures to promise, resistance to the main proposal of the Ministry, namely tariff reform, took a leading place in the Liberal and Labour manifestoes. These parties did not offer merely alternative measures to those of the Ministry, for the Ministry's main proposal was of such vital and general concern that it was bound to prevail over any others. The Labour party, however, besides opposing tariff reform, made proposals for a comprehensive scheme of national work, credit facilities for farmers, and a national levy, to be expended presumably on 'social services'. The Liberals adopted nearly every possible alternative. They criticized the Ministry's past record; they opposed the Ministry's proposals for the future, in respect of tariff reform; they opposed the Labour party's proposals for a capital levy; and they had, among other proposals of their own, one for the development of national credit. When three parties all put forward positive programmes and two of them criticize the past record of the Government, it is a hard business for the electors to know what are the predominant issues of the election.

¹ 9 H.L. Deb., 53., 1005.

In 1929 each party had its particular plans for dealing with the urgent question of the day, namely unemployment. The Conservative Ministers did not claim to have any sovereign specific for this or the other problems requiring solution. Their statement of policy, consisting chiefly of imperial preference and development and limited safeguarding of industries, was generally regarded as lacking in features likely to induce confidence; and, in the absence of any other election cry, they placed their main reliance on the advertisement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Baldwin) as the 'safe' man. In spite of his popularity this reversion to 'men' rather than 'measures' proved unsuccessful. The Liberal and Labour parties made some references to the failures of the recent administration and suggested breaches of faith in the Conservative Ministry; but, in the main, they relied on their proposals for the amelioration of social distress. In so far as the Conservatives placed reliance on their past record, they emphasized the fact that, during their period of office, they had spent more on 'social services' than the Labour Ministry which had preceded them.

As a result of the growth in the size of constituencies, the scale has steadily changed from the stage when political prospects were affected by payments of money to owners of nomination boroughs and when corrupt practice meant personal solicitation, to the stage when candidates of a party repeat their leaders promises of benefits to those whose votes may turn the balance in their favour.

'I sometimes think', said Mr. Baldwin in 1931, 'that the time may come when our enlightened posterity may think it just as inconceivable that men should be returned to Parliament by making promises which they know can never be fulfilled as we regard it as impossible that men should be returned for rotten boroughs.'¹

¹ The Times, 13 June 1931, p. 9.

Dean Inge has gone so far as to suggest that general elections have become public auctions at which the contending parties bid against one another for votes by each promising a larger share than the other of the plunder of the minority.¹ This, perhaps, is an extreme view. It seems evident, however, that the present inclination for rival schemes of beneficent legislation to be placed in the forefront means that judgement on the record of the Ministry may take a subsidiary place. The dangers of this tendency are obvious. How far the people are qualified to deal with the one type of issue, rather than the other, will receive some mention in the concluding chapter.

§ 5. Rules for the submission of issues

It is no easy matter, in the confusion of election issues which has prevailed in the last hundred years, to discover standards by which to determine the proper rights and obligations of the Ministry and the Opposition respecting the definition of such issues. Is a Ministry always under an obligation to produce a policy? Has a Ministry a right to adopt proposals of the Opposition as issues? Has an Opposition the right to raise prospective issues? Is an Opposition ever under an obligation to state its future policy? It is desirable to attempt to elicit some kind of answers to questions of this nature.

A Ministry which has attained to office as a result of the resignation of a preceding Ministry, and has appealed to the country as soon as the business of Parliament has permitted, can hardly be under so great an obligation to produce a programme of legislation as a Ministry which has dissolved after a term of office lasting some years. Since social legislation has become a matter of extreme technicality, it is difficult for a party leader to describe his party's future policy with any particularity, unless he has been in recent touch with the specialists in Government departments.

In 1873, after Gladstone had been defeated on the Irish University Bill, Disraeli was actuated by these considerations, as he himself explained in connexion with his refusal to form a Government. 'There was', he said in Parliament, 'no issue before the country—for I do not suppose that any one would maintain that the Irish University Bill was a question on which we could dissolve.' He argued that his party could not appeal to the country without having 'a matured and complete policy'.

¹ More Lay Thoughts, p. 303.

'I would suggest', he added, 'that it is impossible for those who sit on the Opposition bench suddenly to have a matured policy to present to the people of this country in case Parliament is dissolved. An Opposition, of whatever party it may be formed, is essentially a critical body; it is not a constructive one and it cannot be.'

He cited the Central Asian question, the New Rules for International Law, the French Treaty of Commerce, and local taxation as matters on which it would be difficult to give the electorate proper guidance, unless a Minister had been in power and had had recent access to official information.¹ Gathorne Hardy in particular, among Disraeli's followers, was unable to identify himself with this view; but there is little doubt that Disraeli's real object, as mentioned above,² was to keep the Gladstone Ministry in office until it had become further discredited, a stratagem which proved completely successful.

The contentions of Disraeli have never been repeated in so extreme a form. Perhaps a Ministry, only just in office, may be entitled to some excuse for putting forward its policy somewhat tentatively and in general outline; but on no recent occasions have prospective new Ministries declared themselves incapable of putting a policy before the electorate. In recent years a few leading politicians in Opposition have maintained a closer touch than hitherto, and have even engaged in such regular deliberations as to earn the description of a 'shadow Cabinet'. This kind of organization, assisted by the research departments set up under the Central Offices of parties, has placed Oppositions in a much better position to frame constructive programmes than in the days of Disraeli.

Sometimes Ministries have tried to embarrass their successors by resigning rather than dissolving, so that the other side should have to produce a policy and not merely act as critics. When Gladstone's Home Rule Bill was defeated in 1886, some of his colleagues were in favour of resignation rather than dissolution, mainly on the ground that the incoming Government would have to go to the country on a policy of its own. But Gladstone insisted on dissolution.

¹ 214 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1931-4.

² See p. 218 above.

Similar considerations probably affected Rosebery when he decided to resign on a chance vote regarding a minor question in 1895, and also Balfour, who preferred resignation to dissolution in 1905. The occurrence of incidents such as these proves that it is understood to be incumbent on a Ministry, however new, to produce some kind of positive programme.

The question, whether a Ministry is entitled to adopt the proposals of an Opposition as issues, is well illustrated by the incidents connected with Gladstone's policies regarding Ireland. When he suddenly caused consternation in the country, during the Derby-Disraeli Ministry of 1866-8, by proposing the disestablishment of the Irish Church and by his defeat of the Ministry on that subject, he precipitated a situation to which no existing rules applied. As matters proved, the only question for decision was Gladstone's Irish Church proposal, which became the main issue of the 1868 election; and no one thought of blaming Disraeli for not bringing forward a positive policy in competition with that of Gladstone. The situation in 1880 was altogether different. At the election of that year, Beaconsfield, who again raised no positive issue, endeavoured to gain a majority for his party by censuring in the most vigorous terms the policy of Home Rule—a policy which the Opposition party had not in fact officially adopted. He may, in some subtle way, have sensed the course which Gladstone was about to take; but there was no justification for his attempt to centre the interest of the electors on an Opposition proposal which had never been formulated.

Whether or not the Opposition is, as a matter of general practice, entitled to dictate that its own prospective policy shall dominate as an issue over one raised by the Ministry is not a question capable of receiving a straightforward answer. If there are circumstances, such as those of 1868, where a Ministry is defeated on an important proposal raised by the Opposition, the policy of that proposal will almost of necessity become the leading issue in the ensuing election. But in ordinary circumstances, if an Opposition leader is a man of sufficient force of character to secure the attention of the people, there can be no more objection to the trial of a positive issue raised by the Opposition than to the trial of one raised by the Ministry. In a recent election, that of 1929, Mr. Lloyd George, by reason of his compelling personality, was in a large degree successful in rendering the issue of unemployment the ruling issue of the election.

No one would suggest that the Opposition party is under an obligation to produce, in preparation for a general election, a detailed programme of legislative projects. Gladstone was, it seems, justified in replying to Parnell's attempts to persuade him, in 1885, to formulate with precision his proposals with regard to Ireland, that he was not in office, and that it did not lie with him to make proposals. He also stated, in a memorandum addressed to Lord Rosebery, that it was not 'the province of the person leading the party in opposition to frame and produce before the public detailed schemes' such as those for Home Rule. 'The plan for Ireland', he told his son, Herbert Gladstone, 'ought to be produced by the Government of the day. Principles may be laid down by others, but not the detailed interpretation of them in a measure.'¹

But if the Opposition has, when in office at an earlier time, made abortive attempts to pass an important measure, it may be fair for the Ministry to ask the Opposition to state its policy in regard to the further advancement of that measure. Towards the end of the Conservative Ministry which lasted from 1886 to 1892 it became obvious that the main issue in the ensuing election would again be Home Rule, the subject, that is to say, which had been raised by Gladstone in 1886, and which the Conservatives had eluded by introducing an Irish Government Bill—a Bill which represented the lengths to which they were disposed to go. During the final session of the Parliament Joseph Chamberlain, with some show of reason, tried to extract from Gladstone a definite statement regarding the Liberal policy on Home Rule. In February 1892, four months before the dissolution, Chamberlain taunted Gladstone with a shyness in regard to this matter, which was, as every one knew, due to a lack of unanimity among his colleagues.

'He [Gladstone] knows my plan now,' said Chamberlain. 'Will he not tell me something about his? I do not ask for all the details; general lines will be quite sufficient for my purpose. . . . We are all going to an election. . . . We ought to know, it is not too early to ask for, the policy of the Opposition, which is to be their principal object if they go into power. It is not too early to ask that they should put that forward for general discussion, so that the country may pronounce upon it with full knowledge.'

¹ Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. iii, pp. 230, 258.

In so far as Chamberlain was seeking information in regard to the form which Gladstone's Home Rule policy would take, if he were returned to power, his request was fair; and there is no doubt that this was what he was chiefly seeking. If, however, his words are to be understood as a general inquisition into the positive policy of the Opposition, it is questionable whether Gladstone might not have replied that his chief obligation was to criticize the past record of the Ministry and that, beyond this, he was not bound to do more than deal with subjects which had already been before Parliament, especially those for the introduction of which he had been responsible.

A similar situation arose in 1905, not long before the end of the Balfour Ministry. Balfour had been harassed by the Liberals for many months to give an explicit statement regarding his attitude towards the project of tariff reform. He had replied to these applications, but he realized that the issue of tariff reform was in many respects unpromising; it was fraught with many pitfalls. Political tactics, therefore, demanded that the tables should be turned on the Liberals; and Balfour, having claimed that he had honestly tried to state his policy regarding the fiscal question, invited the Opposition to state its policy in respect of Education, Licensing, and Chinese Labour, among other topics. But the Liberals were far too astute to lay themselves open to attack in this simple fashion. No express response was made to the invitation; and it does not seem that there was any obligation to make any.

There is certainly no justification for the attempt, which has been made both by Ministries and Oppositions, to brand supposedly unpopular proposals presumed to be advanced by the other side, which have never in fact been adopted by them. Such an attempt was made by the Opposition in 1837, when the Conservatives threw out hints of the disasters which would ensue from the expected radical legislation of the Liberal Ministry, and more recently, as has been seen, by the Disraeli Ministry in 1880, when it endeavoured to make Home Rule the leading issue of the election. It is clear that each party must be left to make its own proposals.

What, then, may be regarded as the normal procedure of the Ministry and the Opposition respectively in selecting issues for presentation at a general election? A Ministry which has been for some time in office should, it may be assumed, be ready to vindicate its past record, and should also be prepared to produce a considered statement of its proposed policy for the future. If the Opposition has published a programme of future policy, it is open to the Ministry to criticize it, and, if it likes, to treat it with sufficient seriousness to ensure that the Opposition obtains the distinction of raising the predominant issue.

If a Ministry has only succeeded to power a short while before a dissolution, it will be justified in reflecting on the past record of the Opposition and will not be under an obligation to produce a well-matured programme of future policy.

An Opposition party, on the other hand, unless it has recently been in office, can raise the issue of its own future policy to as slight an extent as it likes, subject to the obligation of stating its views with some particularity on subjects which have previously been in controversy in Parliament and which still remain undetermined. It is also open to it to raise the issues of the Ministry's past record and the Ministry's proposals for the future.

If an Opposition party has been in office until shortly before a dissolution, it must justify its own past record instead of questioning that of the Ministry.

Whatever the circumstances of a Ministry may be at the time of an election, there is an onus upon it to make some proposals in regard to the future, even though they be only roughly outlined or extremely conservative, such as those of Bonar Law in 1922.

§ 6. Influences affecting the submission of issues

Party leaders do not possess the exclusive capacity of prescribing election issues. There are others who have occasionally exercised a considerable influence on the choice of the subjects to be submitted to the people, of which politicians who are not party leaders and political associations are examples.

The notable development of party organization in the last half-century has enabled the Liberal party convention once or twice, and more recently, but to a less extent, the Labour party convention to dictate to leaders the issues to be raised in election campaigns. Even the Conservative party convention has had some influence on the selection of issues. As early as 1883 delegates to the number of two thousand five hundred from five hundred Liberal associations met in conference at Leeds and discussed a reform programme which they desired the Liberal Ministry to adopt. And in October 1891 the Liberal party convention held its famous meeting at Newcastle and drew up a programme of a most heterogeneous character, which was accepted by Gladstone to stand beside Home Rule among the issues of the election of 1892.¹

Although the extent of the influence of party conventions on the selection of issues has fluctuated from time to time, party leaders, whatever the party they may have led, while reserving to themselves very considerable freedom, have not been able to afford to display too obvious a neglect of the resolutions of party conventions respecting the composition of programmes.

Political and other associations of many different kinds have also been responsible for influencing the framing of issues. The first outstanding examples of this class are provided by the organizations which, early in the nineteenth century, interested themselves in the abolition of the slave trade and of slavery. Prior to the election of 1826, James Stephen, the friend of Wilberforce, endeavoured to make the abolition of the slave trade an issue by publishing an address to the whole electorate, in which he recommended that candidates, having been interrogated whether or not they were West-India merchants or proprietors of slaves, should not be supported if the answer was in the affirmative. And again, prior to the election of 1832, the Anti-Slavery Society presented the Whigs with an ultimatum, which, owing to the high proportion of the abolitionists in the electorate, caused the abolition of slavery to be very generally supported in the Whig party; and the Emancipation Bill of 1833 was passed as a direct result of the agitation of the society. The measures instituting free trade, too, though never before the people as a prospective issue, would hardly have been enacted but for the instigation of the Anti-Corn Law League. And, down to the present day, associations endeavour at election times to use their influence, so that there shall be included among the election issues the proposals in which they are interested. At the election of 1906, to choose a random instance, manifestoes were issued by the Cobden Club, the United Irish

¹ Cf. Chapter VI, § 2.

League of Great Britain, and the Free Church Council. The last mentioned dealt with such diverse matters as education, temperance, and Chinese Labour.¹

Not only associations, but independent members of Parliament have sometimes been responsible for the submission of election issues. The occasions have, however, been rare. Before 1832 it may be said to have been almost unknown for an ordinary parliamentary candidate to include subjects of controversy in his election addresses, even though they were approved by the leaders of his party. Gladstone, in his first address to his constituents at Newark in 1832, aroused some consternation in a very limited circle by including mention of such proposed points of policy as the allotment of cottage grounds and a living wage for workmen. It is obvious that the suggestions of this budding Tory politician had no effect whatever on the course of the election as a whole, especially as his constituency was practically a nomination borough; and incidents of this kind were extremely infrequent at that period. After 1832 the growth of party organization soon acted as a restraint on the declarations of candidates of an independent turn of mind.

During the Victorian period, however, two or three private members with outstanding personalities and vigorous views were able to reach the public ear. Bright and Cobden may be recognized as having made their personal influence felt through the Anti-Corn Law League. After the advent of free trade, Bright again influenced the shaping of issues. Palmerston, in the election of 1865, was content merely to seek a renewal of confidence in his Ministry and in himself; but the subject of Parliamentary reform raised considerable interest at the election; and this phase in the campaign was chiefly due to Bright's intervention.

Shortly before interest in the issue of Home Rule largely extinguished interest in all other issues, there came into the forefront of politics two spirited democrats, the one, Joseph Chamberlain, attached to the Liberal party, and the other, Randolph Churchill, attached to the Conservative party. Both of them having an independent and progressive cast of mind and capable of attracting a wide popularity, they were able to gain an influence in the country which qualified them, if not to submit their own programmes for the people's judgement, at least materially to enlarge the scope of the programmes of the parties to which they were attached.

¹ See pp. 87-97 above.

Chamberlain, who was a member of the Gladstone Ministry of 1880-5, made speeches of a strong Radical persuasion during 1885, which not only caused offence to the Queen, but alarmed his leader, who protested against the 'unauthorized programme', consisting of such projects as free education, improved housing, and the payment of members. Some attempt was made by Gladstone to bring his advanced colleague into line with the official policy; but Chamberlain's proposals, as well as the three acres and a cow of Jesse Collings, played a considerable part in the election of 1885.

The Conservative party had somewhat similar embarrassments to face as a result of the advocacy of Tory democracy by Randolph Churchill. His personal popularity was as large as, if not larger than, that of Chamberlain. And notwithstanding the fact that his Dartford Programme of 1886, which included projects for a Land Bill, provision of allotments, and reform of local taxation, cannot, perhaps, be described as unauthorized, it caused considerable perplexity and astonishment in Tory circles. It was thought at least that Churchill was arrogating to himself some of the functions of his leader.

Although Joseph Chamberlain changed his political allegiance and joined the Conservative party, his temperament was such that he could not fit into any party mould. The story of his raising the tariff reform issue in 1903 and of its submission to the electorate in 1906 has already been noticed. It is only necessary, in view of the wide knowledge of the circumstances, to make bare mention of this second outburst of Chamberlain, as the most signal of the instances of the submission of a great issue being influenced by a person who was not a member of the Ministry or a leader of the Opposition. If it be said that the policy was officially adopted by the Conservative party, then it must be admitted that the adoption was attributable to Chamberlain alone. The extent to which he secured support for his plan among the Conservative party appears from a contemporary estimate of the character of the members returned at the election of 1906. It was computed that, of 157 Conservative members elected, 102 were Chamberlain Tariff Reformers, 36 Balfourites, 16 Unionist Free Fooders, and 3 unclassified.¹

¹ Annual Register, 1906, Part I, p. 12.

The occasions on which party leaders have failed to ensure that the programmes which they intend to announce at general elections will be accepted by their followers have happily been rare. In 1895 disunion in the ranks of the Liberals was the cause of a variety of issues being prescribed by Liberal ex-Ministers. Rosebery, the late Prime Minister, was not in a sufficiently strong position to insist that the issue on which he wished the election to be fought, namely the reform of the House of Lords, should be the one accepted by his party. Morley, for instance, asserted that Home Rule was the issue; Harcourt chose local option; and many private members stood for the Newcastle programme. It is obvious that, in circumstances such as these, not only is the interpretation of the voting at the election, as a decision on policy, impossible, but the prospects of the disunited party are rendered hopeless; and so it proved in 1895.

When the relative importance of issues respecting the future and the past was discussed a few pages back, the growing tendency for promises of prospective benefits to engage the attention of the electorate at the expense of the exercise of judgement on the past administration became noticeable. This tendency is apt to be emphasized when politicians are able to transgress the limits authorized by their leaders and to succeed in having the acceptability of their own projects determined by the people. Although it is not inevitable that issues raised independently of the authority of party leaders will consist of offers of short cuts to Utopia, there is a serious risk of this being so.

An issue is not as a rule submitted to the people without their first showing some evidence of their interest in the subject for treatment, and at least some indication of the probability of their approval. This is, indeed, one of the most elementary principles of political strategy. There have been occasions when party leaders have preferred to allow their parliamentary candidates to raise a particular issue in their constituencies, if pressed to do so, rather than to prescribe that issue as one officially recognized by the party. In other words, they have deemed it wise to wait for evidence of a demand from the people before committing themselves to a policy which might prove their undoing. The Derby Ministry could not make up its mind in 1852, until it was too late to affect the course of the election, whether the issue of protection was one which could prudently be adopted. As a result individual Conservative candidates were left to raise the standard of protection or not to do so, as they or their constituencies pleased. This was what the Conservative party leaders wanted, namely a means of discovering the current of feeling in the country. As it proved, among a general obscurity of election facts, one point was clear—the people did not want protection. But the decision was not one made after an official submission. If it can be so described, it was inferred as a result of local investigations.

An opposite result occurred, or was alleged to have occurred, in 1866. Gladstone and many others of his party, although they had been in favour of the measures of the Liberal Reform Bill of 1866, admitted that the Liberals did not officially raise the issue of Reform in the election of the preceding year. The Liberal Ministry, Gladstone said, was of opinion that the Reform question should not again be pursued until there had developed such a state of public opinion as might seem to afford a prospect of success. 'We left the country', he explained, 'to pronounce its own impartial judgment; we waited . . . for spontaneous indications of the public mind with regard to the representation of the people in Parliament.' And he concluded that the inference to be drawn from the conduct of the constituencies was that the people desired the introduction of another measure of Reform.¹

It is a little difficult to understand how it is possible for the electors to raise an issue and, at the same time, to give judgement on it. Presumably the meaning to be attributed to Gladstone's words is this: if sufficient interest in the subject of Reform were taken in the constituencies, candidates would have been forced to raise the issue independently of direction from their party leaders; and, if the returns of members for constituencies in which the issue was raised were examined, it would be seen that, in most cases, the candidates who favoured Reform had been returned.

Incidents of this kind suggest a solicitude for the wishes of the people which can be over-estimated. The hesitation to raise an issue officially has generally been due as much to divisions among party adherents or to doubt regarding the efficacy of the proposal to secure a majority, as to a desire not to force the submission on an unwilling electorate. This was particularly clear when, in 1880, the leaders of the Liberals being divided on the question whether Home Rule should be an issue, it was held that this must be left as a matter for individual decision of Liberal candidates.

¹ 189 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 115.

It has not always been the habit of party leaders to wait for the people to give proof of their desire for the introduction of particular measures of importance. The absence of any general demand did not prevent Gladstone from undertaking the project of the disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1867. This measure was not the result of pressure, or even of any very widespread interest on the part of the people; but the Bill was not formally introduced until after the people had declared in its favour in the election of 1868. Again, Chamberlain's speech in 1903, which comprised the first exposition of his proposed policy of tariff reform, came as a surprise both to his colleagues and to the people at large.

Although it may be said that party leaders generally confine their proposals to subjects which have attracted the attention of the public, it is, perhaps, impossible to point to any great policy which has been made an election issue as a result of its initiation by the people themselves. Those who assert that there can be no such thing as the spontaneous action of public opinion will readily agree with this conclusion. It is necessary for the agitation of politicians or political associations or some other agency to kindle the interest which has been described as the normal condition precedent to the submission of an issue to the people.

The movement for free trade in the early Victorian period has been instanced as one having its origin in the people; and, in so far as this statement implies an origin at the circumference of the political structure rather than at the centre, there is some truth in it. But in fact its advancement, if not its initiation, was, like that of any other policy, due to persons whose identity is discoverable. The Anti-Corn Law League took so large a part in the transaction that it is hardly fair to exclude it from the main share in the credit, or discredit, of securing the passing of the necessary measures.

Another instance of an issue alleged to have had a purely popular origin is that of Chinese Labour in the election of 1906. But examples of this kind suggest another factor, which is easily confused with the influence of the people, namely the influence of the press; and this factor has been so fully discussed in books on the development of democratic government that it seems unnecessary to pursue the subject here.¹

¹ See, e.g., Bryce, Modern Democracies, vol. i, pp. 104 ff.

CHAPTER XI

THE ISSUES (cont.)

§ 1. The time for elections

(a) Auspicious moments.

IT has been seen that, from the earliest stage in which the people have had any control over the course of policy, the choice of the subjects for their consideration has not been necessarily confined to the Ministry in power, though the Ministry has obviously been in a peculiarly advantageous position to determine that choice. But the choice of the time for the submission of issues has, within the limits of the prescribed periods of Parliaments, always been in the hands of the Sovereign or the Ministry. Now that it is an accepted convention of the Constitution that a dissolution will be granted on the advice of the Ministry almost as a matter of course, the Ministry alone controls the very important factor of time. There may, however, have to be some modification of this convention, as is remarked later,¹ if the two-party system is superseded by a three-party system or a system of groups.

The ability of the Ministry to determine the times for dissolutions has upon numerous occasions enabled it to seize upon advantageous situations for appeals to the people. A favourable opportunity for the raising of a cry, the satisfactory outcome of a foreign policy undertaken by the Ministry, and even the unpreparedness of the other side have induced the leaders in power suddenly to fix on a date for dissolution considerably in advance of the time when the current Parliament would normally expire.

Between the passing of the Triennial Act in 1694 and of the Septennial Act in 1715 the three-year period of Parliament was not strictly maintained. On more than one occasion, a dissolution was sought at a time earlier than that which might normally have been expected. The most notable of these occasions was the dissolution of November 1701, when the Parliament had been in existence for less than a year. In the preceding months it had become obvious that the attempt of the French King to dictate to England on the subject of the succession to the English throne was arousing a violent popular antagonism to France and, consequently, an enthusiasm for the policy of war, in support of which William III desired a reliable majority in the House of Commons. William III, therefore, seized upon this favourable conjuncture to dissolve Parliament. The device proved successful, since the King obtained an assured majority in favour of his plans.

¹ See pp. 271, 280 below.

Another wave of popular sentiment was exploited by the Ministry in 1713, when a dissolution was precipitated so as immediately to follow the public thanksgiving for peace. It was said, in a letter to the Earl of Oxford, that many of his supporters were

‘impatient for a dissolution, not only for putting an end to expenses, but because they think they can never go to their elections with more advantage than while the impressions made by the rejoicings at the thanksgiving and by the Queen’s incomparable speech are fresh in the minds of their electors’.¹

Considerations of the same kind applied just ninety-nine years later, when the unexpected dissolution of 1812 was attributed to the desire of the Government to benefit by the more peaceful conditions and by the occurrence in that year of a plentiful harvest.

For many years after the passing of the Septennial Act of 1715, Parliaments normally lasted nearly their full term of seven years. In 1747, however, after but six years had run, the Government decided that a surprise dissolution would help to consolidate its majority. Discreet preparations were made; and, among other steps, it was arranged that the British troops in the Netherlands should for the moment remain on the defensive, in case the Ministry should lose support owing to a military reverse. The stratagem appears to have been entirely justified by the event, and several seats were gained.

It was not until 1774 that a similar experiment was undertaken—this time with a smaller measure of success. The Ministry did not take action under the impression that the occasion was specially propitious. The political outlook could by no means be described as a cheerful one. On the contrary, the position was extremely depressing. Relations with the American colonies had steadily worsened; and it was feared that they might even become disastrous. Encouraged, however, by an interval of some hopefulness, the Ministry determined to hasten the date of a dissolution, which would have been inevitable in 1775. The intention was rather to face the election campaign before the prospect grew even less bright, than to seize upon a particularly auspicious moment. The King approved, and even initiated, the design. He reckoned that the unexpectedness of the dissolution would assist the country gentry and would frustrate the 'nabobs', whom he expected to be unprepared.¹

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm. (Portland MSS.), vol. v, p. 908.

A successful result could only be claimed by the Ministry in so far as it could be said that a débâcle had been avoided. The Ministry suffered from the disadvantage of unpreparedness, which affected it adversely, as well as the Opposition. Although some preparation for the election could be made in secret, secrecy was bound to handicap those who relied on the element of surprise as well as those for whom the surprise was arranged.²

This game of catching opponents unawares is altogether unjustifiable and cannot tend towards the proper ends of government. The Grenville Ministry in 1806, although claiming to dissolve Parliament so as to obtain a confirmation by the people of its war policy, had for a main object an improvement in Parliamentary strength. But it soon found that it could suffer from reprisals. The Portland Ministry, which quickly succeeded it, almost immediately followed the precedent of a sudden dissolution and appealed to the people in 1807—a proceeding, in the view of many observers, as unnecessary as that of 1806. The Portland Ministry, as the King's saviours from the bugbear of Roman Catholic Emancipation, succeeded in fostering the old cry of 'No popery'; and it was evident that the Ministers were determined to take advantage of the heats so engendered before they had time to subside. Although the formal issue raised in the King's Speech was the propriety of the conduct of the Sovereign in changing his advisers, the religious question was undoubtedly that which was intended to sway the votes of the electors.³

The protest of Hawkesbury (the Opposition leader in 1806) that there was nothing at issue between the twosides respecting the prosecution of the war is very similar to the protest of Grenville (the leader of the Opposition in 1807) that, as far as his party was concerned, there was no ground for the submission of any issue respecting the Roman Catholic question. Each in turn felt aggrieved, and rightly so, at the opportunism of the other. Hawkesbury said, in 1806, that he could find no cause, except that of convenience, to warrant the dissolution, since 'on no subject which ever engaged the attention of the country had there been such complete unanimity as in regard to the supporting his Majesty in the prosecution of the war'.¹ Likewise Grenville, in 1807, asserted that there was 'no idea entertained of withdrawing public confidence from Ministers. The alarm was, therefore, ill-founded'.² There can be little question but that both the dissolutions were determined upon chiefly with the object of securing an enlarged majority.

¹ Correspondence of George III and Lord North, vol. i, p. 201.

² A. von Ruville, William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, vol. iii, p. 285.

³ 9 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 552.

The only safeguard against abuses of this kind is their ultimate condemnation by public opinion. That Ministries should have the power to choose the time for appeals to the people is, as Peel once said, a principle 'of a delicate nature to meddle with',³ but that they should indulge in sudden and unexpected appeals for ends of their own and apart from the true interests of the people is indefensible and must lead to the submission of false and not real issues.

These considerations have become more fully realized in modern times, with the result that imputations of mixed motives are rarer. The sudden dissolution of 1900, however, which led to the 'khaki election' was widely criticized as an attempt to make capital out of a passing patriotic fervour. It is certainly difficult to believe that the desire to obtain the authority of the people for the completion of the South African War was the principal motive for the dissolution. But the dissolution could not have been long delayed, as the Parliament was in its sixth year.

Instances may be found in which severe temptations to profit by fortuitous situations have been resisted. In the summer of 1878, Beaconsfield, after returning from his triumphs at the Congress of Berlin, and after receiving a considerable ovation from the London crowds, had to decide whether he would seize what was an almost assured opportunity of his party obtaining three or four years' extension of office. The question was debated in the Cabinet, which decided that it was not proper to exploit the recent success in foreign policy, and that there was no constitutional ground for obtaining a dissolution, when the Ministry had had consistent and sufficient support in the House of Commons. It has been suggested that the Conservatives would have displayed strategical ability if they had arranged an election immediately after gaining credit from the outcome of the General Strike in 1926. But many persons thought that it would have been unscrupulous to profit by such an opportunity.

¹ 8 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 21.

² 9 Parl. Deb., 1 s., 602.

³ 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 810.

Just in the same way that Ministries have seized upon auspicious moments to appeal to the electors so also have they been astute in avoiding inauspicious occasions. It was admitted, after the event, by both Wellington and Peel that Wellington's resignation in November 1830, when defeated on an unimportant vote, was only a pretext for an escape from office and that the real reason was a desire not to 'expose his Majesty and the country to the consequences which might result from the Government going out on the question of parliamentary reform'.¹ Peel saw disadvantages in appealing to the country on an issue of free trade in 1846. Queen Victoria offered Russell a dissolution after his defeat in the House of Commons in February 1852; but the situation was so unpromising that he and his colleagues were unanimous in declining the offer. The circumstances in which Balfour preferred resignation to dissolution in 1905 are mentioned at a later stage in the present chapter. These are but one or two reminders of circumstances in which expediency has restrained Ministries from making appeals to the people. But just as a higher standard, it may be hoped, is prevailing in regard to the choice of time for elections, so too there is, perhaps, less disposition nowadays to shirk submissions to the people on proper occasions, even though they may seem unpropitious.

(b) *Change of Ministry.*²

There was in the eighteenth century a common opinion that each Parliament should run its full course of seven years; and that there was no justification for a break in the period, even though a change in the Ministry occurred. After the dismissal of the Fox-North Coalition Ministry in 1783, Fox and his supporters were afraid of a dissolution; and their arguments against the admissibility of Pitt's securing a new Parliament were to some extent based on the notion that a change of Ministries did not justify a dissolution. Burke described a dissolution in such circumstances as 'penal'; and it was characterized by Fox as unconstitutional. The opinion of Lord Somers, many decades old, was quoted in support of an assertion that the King had no power to allow a new Minister a new Parliament.

¹ A. Todd, Parliamentary Government, 2nd ed., vol. i, p. 187.

² Reference may be made to the Chart opposite p. 326.

In the course of the mutual recriminations regarding the dissolutions of 1806 and 1807, just mentioned, it was maintained that the dissolution of 1784, after the course of Parliament had run but four years, was altogether unique and unsuited to form a precedent. Hawkesbury then emphasized the fact that, with one exception (demises of the Crown apart), no Parliament had lasted less than six sessions since the passing of the Septennial Act in 1715. If it had been an accepted rule that a change from one Ministry to another not only justified, but usually involved a new Parliament, the surprise dissolution of 1807 would not have been open to criticism by the Opposition.

Peel's decision, however, to advise a dissolution of Parliament in 1834, when he issued his famous Tamworth Manifesto, was justified by him in Parliament chiefly upon the ground that a change of Ministries was, of itself, sufficient reason for the summoning of a new Parliament. He quoted the dissolutions of 1784, 1806, 1807, and 1831 as instances of dissolutions following upon changes in Ministries. It is doubtful whether this argument carried much weight, since the four occasions of dissolution which he mentioned were not regarded as necessarily required by the appointment of new Ministers.¹ Moreover, it does not appear to be certain that, if Melbourne had resigned, instead of obtaining a dissolution, in 1841, Peel would have then submitted himself to the people immediately after assuming office. His remarks in Parliament prior to the dissolution rather suggest that he would not have done so.

As has been noticed when the influence of the people on the choice of Ministries was discussed in Chapter VII, the defeat of the Government on a vital subject or a change of Government from one party to another did not come to be recognized as involving an appeal to the people until towards the end of the reign of Queen Victoria. When, for instance, the Liberals resigned owing to their difficulties in dealing with the question of Reform in 1866, the Conservatives, who succeeded them, did not consider it necessary to obtain an immediate general election. The same Parliament included Ministries from opposite sides of the House.

¹ 26 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 226-7.

At the present day, however, it has become a recognized convention that there shall be a new Parliament for a new Ministry in all ordinary instances: in other words, a change of Ministry requires a fresh reference to the electorate. A dissolution followed immediately after the Bonar Law Ministry succeeded the Lloyd George Ministry in 1922. And the difference of opinion which existed regarding the need for a general election in 1931 was doubtless settled largely as a result of the realization that the change from the Labour Ministry to the Coalition or Joint Ministry required, according to modern usage, a fresh mandate from the people. As Mr. MacDonald said in his manifesto, 'The working of Parliamentary institutions, of democratic responsibility, and of constitutional practice demands it.'¹

The argument, then, which was in times past used by the Opposition against a dissolution, on the ground that the period of a Parliament should not be interrupted, may be regarded as obsolete, unless a three-party or group system becomes prevalent. In this event, the more frequent changes in the composition of Ministries, incidental to a multiplicity of parties, may cause a revision of the present understanding regarding the suitability of times for appeals to the people.²

(c) Absence of tumult.

Another argument, favoured both by Ministries and Oppositions, has had as its object the prevention of threatened dissolutions of Parliament. This, like the argument that Parliaments must run their full course, may be regarded as obsolete.

From the beginning of the period when general elections took the form of appeals to the people down to the middle of the nineteenth century, it was frequently contended that questions of policy should not be referred to the people when those questions stimulated passionate excitement. The Septennial Act of 1715 was passed to avoid the turbulence which, it was thought by the Whigs, would be encouraged by a general election at a time when Jacobitism was a real menace. In the event of a genuine apprehension of rebellion, very strenuous steps are doubtless justified; and it was on these grounds that the Septennial Act dealt not merely with the term of future Parliaments but also with that of the current Parliament. It referred, however, to the 'more violent and lasting heats and animosities among the subjects of this realm', which had been occasioned as a result of the institution of triennial elections.

¹ The Times, 8 Oct. 1931.

² See p. 280 below.

Whether or not the passing of the Septennial Act had the effect of reducing the intensity of 'heats and animosities' seems to have been a matter of controversy. In a debate on a motion for the repealing of this Act in 1734, the Opposition maintained that there had been greater ferments since 1715 than there had been before that date. However that may be, the debate included a bold and, as it was then, an original observation by Sir William Wyndham, the leader of the Tory Opposition, in regard to the more general aspect of popular interest in election campaigns.

'As to the elections coming on when the Nation is in a ferment,' he said, 'it is so far from being an objection to frequent elections, that it is, in my opinion, Sir, a strong argument in favour of them; because it is one of the chief supports of the freedom of the nation. It is plain that the people seldom or ever were in a ferment, but when incroachments were made upon their rights and privileges; and when any such are made, it is very proper, nay it is even necessary, that the people should be allowed to proceed to a new election, in order that they may chuse such representatives as will do them justice, by punishing those who have been making incroachments upon them. . . .'¹

Sir Robert Walpole, in defending the retention of the Septennial Act, mentioned the fickleness and instability of the people as a ground for the longer period of Parliaments.

When the periods of Parliaments were reduced by the provisions of the Parliament Act, 1911, from seven to five years, no one thought of suggesting that the alteration would increase the opportunities for 'heats and animosities' among the people. The clause in question received less than one hour's consideration in the debate in the House of Commons—partly as a result, no doubt, of the application of modern rules of procedure. It seems to have aroused very little interest, in notable contrast, for instance, to the circumstances of the debate of 1734.¹

¹ 9 Parl. Hist. 458. Cf. Hallam, Constitutional History (1876 ed.), vol. iii, p. 237.

In the nineteenth century the strongest objections to taking the judgement of an excited people proceeded from Peel. When the question of Roman Catholic claims was being debated in 1821, he said that he should deprecate on that, as he had done on other subjects, an appeal to the excited passions of the people. 'Against such appeals', he stated, 'I should always set my face; believing, as I do, that the deliberate wisdom of Parliament is better calculated to weigh maturely the important bearings of any great question, than the general opinion of parties elsewhere.'²

Opponents of the great Reform Bill, and Peel in particular, viewed with more than concern the reference of that Bill to the decision of the people. Then, if at any time, the people were in a ferment; and it was widely feared that a general election might, in the prevailing circumstances, lead to a state of civil war. The King himself, a short while before the dissolution of April 1831, wrote to Grey, the Prime Minister, stating his firm conviction that, if 'what is called an appeal to the people' were made 'when a spirit of agitation which has been so long in progress has been much increased by the introduction of the Bill and the discussion upon it, this country would be thrown into convulsion from Land's End to John O'Groats House'. The King, at that stage, refused to assent to proposals for a dissolution which might, as he thought, involve disorder and bloodshed.³

Peel condemned the idea of a submission to the people in regard to Reform, after as well as before the election of 1831. Even when the election was safely over, he deprecated the taking of the opinion of 'an already excited people, on a question of all others requiring sober and dispassionate enquiry', and predicted that, 'when the steady good sense and reason of the people of England shall return, they will be the first to reproach us with the baseness of having sacrificed the Constitution in the vain hope of conciliating the favour of a temporary burst of popular feeling'.⁴ After the House of Lords had thrown out the Bill, in the autumn of 1831, the agitation became more intense than ever; and the opponents of Reform once more deplored the passing

¹ 25 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 343-54.

² 4 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 1003.

³ Correspondence of King William IV and Earl Grey, vol. i, pp. 179-82.

⁴ 4 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 891-2.

of legislation on a matter of such deep concern in times of excitement. At this stage Macaulay disclosed, in a masterly way, the evasion practised by the Tories. When there were but small signs of popular interest in Reform, they placed reliance on the apparent lack of demand. When the whole country was convulsed, they alleged that the time was inappropriate. 'Half the logic of misgovernment', he said, 'lies in this one sophistical dilemma: If the people are turbulent, they are unfit for liberty: if they are quiet, they do not want liberty.'¹

Although Peel came to accept the result of the Reform Act of 1832 as a settlement which had to be respected, he still seemed to retain his belief in the danger of submitting questions to the people which might arouse in them too keen an interest. His view of the political conditions in the spring of 1841 was that Melbourne should resign and leave him to succeed without the necessity of a general election. One of his arguments against Melbourne's threatened dissolution, the technical right to which he did not deny, was the alleged inflammation of the popular mind by the Ministry in regard to 'such a subject as the sustenance of the people'. Although it was not generally known for some years afterwards, Melbourne's personal view (which was in opposition to that of the majority of his colleagues) was that it was undesirable to dissolve Parliament and appeal to the people 'when their passions were raised on any subject, but more especially on such a subject as food'.²

Hobhouse and Macaulay both replied to Peel's argument. The former merely disclaimed responsibility for the excited state of the people. 'Surely', he said, 'the agitation, if agitation there is to be, is no fault of ours.' And, after defining the fiscal question which the country would have to determine, he added: 'If the people feel a lively interest in the determination of this question, I cannot help it.' Macaulay, however, went to the root of the matter when he asserted that it was only proper that the people should take the most intense interest in matters closely affecting them.

'It has been said reproachfully,' he remarked, 'What! dissolve on a popular question, when there is such agitation, such excitement! But on what suit or popular question should there be a dissolution? On what question appeal to the people, but a question in which they felt interested? As to the agitation which was suggested, there was no agitation but of the most legitimate description; there was no excitement—no agitation—but what was created of and by the people. Surely the right honourable baronet [Peel] did not mean to suggest that the people were not to feel excited, were not to get up an agitation among themselves upon questions which they could not but perceive came home to their pockets, to their best interests and comforts?"¹

¹ 9 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 381-2.

² Lord Broughton, Recollections of a Long Life, vol. 6, pp. 26-8.

In spite, however, of Peel's submissions to the people in his Tamworth Manifestoes on occasions when he badly needed the people's votes, he remained to the end, as has already been pointed out, chary of appealing to them on issues of policy. When the great question of the repeal of the Corn Laws was at its most critical stage, he considered it dangerous to refer it to popular decision. In writing a review of his action at that time, he explained that there seemed to him to be grave objections to inviting an expression of the opinion of the people on a subject which would not only raise the heats and animosities so often apprehended, but would, as a result of the excitement which would be raised in the constituencies, preclude the possibility of a dispassionate consideration in Parliament.²

A study of the problems of crowd psychology and of the effects of mass suggestion appears to have emphasized the unsatisfactory quality of decisions made by large numbers of persons who are incapable or, what is important in the present context, are rendered incapable of calm and deliberate judgement. While few politicians would contend nowadays that the people must not be allowed to have matters referred to them which stimulate them to excitement, it is widely realized that any calculated attempt by party or other political organizations unduly to arouse the emotions of electors must stultify the means of democratic government. In several of the incidents which have been described so as to illustrate objections to appeals to the people at times of political excitement, there was a notable failure to recognize this distinction. It was, however, clearly denoted by Macaulay in 1841, when he remarked that the excitement over the issue of the day was legitimate, in that it was 'created of and by the people' and was not provoked by politicians.

¹ 58 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 817-21, 850-1, 887. On another occasion Macaulay observed that 'in this country scarcely any great abuse was ever removed till the public feeling had been roused against it; and that the public feeling has seldom been roused against abuses without exertions to which the name of agitation may be given'. 'The truth is', he added, 'that agitation is inseparable from popular government.' 51 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 821.

² Sir Robert Peel's Memoirs, vol. ii, pp. 163 ff.

Not only has a Ministry with a safe majority complete ability to delay the time of dissolution up to the very end of a period of Parliament, but it has more than once induced Parliament to pass a law extending the period of a current Parliament. The passing of the Septennial Act of 1715 has just been mentioned. The precedent set on that occasion was, in a limited sense, followed during the war of 1914-18, when the period of a single Parliament was extended so as to last from 1910 to 1918. This power of deferring the date for the dissolution of an existing Parliament provided Dicey's favourite illustration of the sovereignty of the legislature. The capacity of deciding the period of future Parliaments is of small account, compared with that of extending an existing one beyond the limit applicable at the time of its election.

(d) Adverse by-elections.

Arguments for the delay of general elections until a state of excitement among the people has subsided have been advanced both from the Ministerial and from the Opposition sides. On several occasions during the last half-century it has been contended that, owing to a succession of by-election results going adversely to the Ministry, the views of the people should be ascertained without delay by means of a general election. This is, of course, an argument which is much more likely to be used by the Opposition than by the Ministry. It is suggestive of the close connexion between the two means of popular expression, namely public opinion and voting.

The circumstances of 1841, to which reference has been made in the preceding pages of this chapter, produced arguments based on the course of by-election results of a different character from those more lately adopted. In that year Peel made a motion of want of confidence in the Melbourne Ministry, and at the same time asserted that the occasion was inopportune for a dissolution, because there was evidence from recent by-elections that the Liberals were in a minority in the country. He alleged that, among some twenty by-elections held during the current Parliament, in which changes in party representation had taken place, sixteen had been adverse to the Liberals and only four in their favour.¹

¹ 78 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 817-18.

In the days of Peel it had not yet become recognized that, if there was a clear indication of a trend of public opinion against the Ministry, the people should be given an opportunity of electing a new Parliament. Consequently, the loss by the party in office of more by-elections than they had won was used by the leader of the Opposition as an argument for resignation rather than for an appeal to the people.

After the Reform Act of 1867, a balance of by-election results in favour of the Opposition, if not admitted as a reason for an early general election, was confidently advanced as such on several occasions. While it is probable that Gladstone would not have wished publicly to ascribe in so many words his advice of a dissolution in February 1874 to recent bad fortune in the constituencies, he told the Queen that he had laid before the Cabinet 'a pretty full outline of the case as to the weakness of the Government since the crisis of last March, and the increase of that weakness, especially of late, from the unfavourable character of the local indications'. He also spoke to her of 'the course of local elections' having been unpropitious. A more intimate communication, written to a supporter, Lord Aberdare, disclosed more fully Gladstone's real motives. He wrote: 'The continual loss of elections and the expediency of avoiding being further weakened have determined us at once to take the opinion of the country and to stand or fall by it.'¹

As the circumstances of the dissolution of 1874 have been a matter of controversy, it may be added that the course of recent by-elections was indirectly admitted to be a reason for an appeal to the people in Gladstone's manifesto to his electors, published prior to the general election. He told his constituency that the Ministry had been embarrassed by the rejection of its measures by the House of Lords, a course, he said, which that House would hardly have taken had 'the isolated and less certain, but still frequent and fresh indications of public opinion at single elections continued to be in harmony with the powerful and authentic, but now more remote judgment of [the general election of] 1868'.² It will be remembered that the crisis of 1873, to which Gladstone referred, had arisen in very peculiar and unusual circumstances. The Conservatives had avoided any situation likely to precipitate a dissolution, since they believed that the longer it was delayed the more marked would be the swing of the pendulum in their favour. The Liberal Ministry, on the other hand, would have been glad to have found some opportunity for an early dissolution, since it was fully aware that the sooner the campaign took place the less were its chances of defeat.

¹ The letter was quoted some years afterwards in the House of Commons. 150 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 79.

² Annual Register, 1874, Part I, p. 2.

The reasons for Gladstone's advice of a dissolution in 1874 were the subject of a heated altercation between Asquith and Balfour in the House of Commons in 1905, when the Opposition charged the Conservative Ministry with maintaining itself in office in the face of adverse by-elections. Balfour, the Prime Minister, argued that, in spite of the terms of Gladstone's advice to the Queen, above quoted, Gladstone had alleged that it would be improper for a Government to go out simply because by-elections had gone against it, without considering other motives, and that

'all precedent, all law, all common sense, shows that it is for the House of Commons, and the House of Commons alone, to determine whether a Government shall receive that measure of support which will enable it to carry out the duties entrusted to it by the Sovereign and expected from it by the country'.¹

It may well have been that, although Gladstone had no objection to telling the Queen that the adverse course of by-elections was one of the strongest motives for his advice to her, he would have preferred that it did not become generally known that it had a predominant influence in determining the date of the general election, lest the occasion came to be used as a precedent.

The Conservative Ministry, which resigned at the end of 1905, had been urged by the Liberals as early as the spring of 1904 that its proper course was to dissolve, because a certain number of by-elections had been going against it. Balfour flatly denied this obligation. 'I do not for one instant admit', he said, 'that the by-elections are a test, or ought to be regarded as a test of public feeling. . . . They are not, and they cannot be made, the index and the test of what the feeling of the people of the country is as a whole.'²

It is obvious that constitutional law does not recognize an obligation on a Ministry to dissolve Parliament even after a succession of sensational changes in local representation. If enough seats are lost by a Ministry to place it in a minority in the House of Commons, the problem solves itself. If a Ministry, whose majority at the beginning of a new Parliament is so large that it is not turned into a minority by the loss of a considerable number of seats, insists on retaining office after such a loss, it cannot be forced to dissolve. But, surely enough, it will pay a double penalty, in number of casualties, when a dissolution becomes inevitable.

¹ 141 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 160-2, 181-2.

² 132 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 1015-16.

(e) General remarks.

It is convenient to remark here that the tactics adopted by Balfour at the end of 1905, when he finally resigned rather than advise a dissolution, appear to have violated the proper standards governing the relations between a Ministry and the people. If, as the Balfour Ministry presumably realized, it was questionable whether it retained the confidence of the people, the proper course was a dissolution of Parliament. As it was, Balfour seems to have decided that it would prove a good tactical move, in the interests of his party, to throw the onus of the production of a programme on the Liberals, who, he judged, were ill prepared for such a course. The situation was in many respects similar in 1895, when Rosebery resigned after a defeat in the House of Commons on a minor question, in preference to dissolving Parliament. The weakness of his position was evidently his reason; but Salisbury, who succeeded him, told the Queen that the constitutional course would have been for Rosebery to dissolve; and the Queen seems to have agreed with this view.¹

It is probable that resignations, like those of 1885, 1895, and 1905, unaccompanied by appeals to the people, will become increasingly rare. Unless, indeed, a Ministry confesses itself to be in so utterly weak and incompetent a condition as to be unable to stand in competition with an alternative Ministry, it will presumably, on being defeated in the House of Commons on an important vote, seek the judgement of the country, as it did, for instance, successfully in 1831 and 1857, and unsuccessfully in 1841, 1859, 1886, and 1925. But, even if this course does not become usual, a Ministry should not shift the onus of dissolution on to the Opposition simply by way of finesse.

Once again, it must be remembered that constitutional conventions may be modified if the two-party system ceases to be operative.

¹ The Letters of Queen Victoria, 3rd Series, vol. ii, p. 525.

There have been stages during recent years in which there has been noticeable a tendency for dissolutions to become more frequent than before. This may be attributable to several causes: the growth of the understanding that practically every change from a Ministry of one party to that of another involves an appeal to the people; the general development of the notion of the mandate; and the difficulties in the relations between the two Houses. Quite recently a new factor, that of the advent of a third party, has been imported into the political situation. If this is to be a constant or recurring factor, it seems that it will be necessary to have a revision of the rules governing the times when it is appropriate to make appeals to the people. Either the Sovereign will have to exercise a real power of refusing a dissolution, or it will have to be laid down that a dissolution can only be claimed in certain recognized circumstances. It has been accepted for many years that the Sovereign can only very exceptionally refuse to dissolve Parliament, when advised so to act by his Ministry. Even as far back as 1806, when it was admitted by the Opposition, who criticized the surprise dissolution of that year, that the King was entitled to grant a dissolution whenever he chose, it was evident that the King realized that he could not refuse his consent without at the same time requiring the resignation of the Ministry.

This understanding was questioned by Lord Oxford and Asquith in 1923, during the first Labour Ministry, a Ministry which had fewer assured supporters in the House of Commons than the Conservative party, and which could only retain a majority if it continued to be reinforced by the Liberals. Those who differed from Lord Oxford and Asquith maintained that the Labour Ministry might at any time insist on a right to force a dissolution, although it turned on an issue selected by that Ministry, and although the dissolution appeared to its opponents to be arbitrary and unwarranted. As matters turned out, the Labour Ministry obtained a dissolution in 1924, in circumstances which were allowed on every side to be sufficient, so that the question of a right to a dissolution was not put to a trial.

The system in this country, which provides for a maximum period for Parliaments, has, it seems, several advantages over those which provide for fixed times for general elections. France (in practice) and the United States of America provide the most obvious examples of the latter. The character of the issues raised in England differ from those which arise under systems with fixed terms. Where it is possible for the supervision of important points of policy to precipitate general elections, it is more likely that issues of policy will predominate rather than issues which concern the choice of rival party leaders. In so far, moreover, as issues of policy enter into the election campaigns in either system, they are more likely to be precise in England than in a country having a legislature with a fixed term, since a question is probably ripe for decision if a Ministry obtains a dissolution on a defeat in regard to it in the House of Commons. Where the electors know that no general election can possibly take place before a certain date, party organization does not maintain a constant efficiency, and interest in politics during the periods between elections is apt to flag, with the result that public opinion fails to carry out its function of preparation for the decisions which the people have the opportunity of making through the casting of their votes. It may well happen, as in France, that a representative chamber with a fixed term obtains great power, at the expense of the Ministry and the people.

On the other hand, it has been suggested, but not very convincingly, that fixed election dates tend to avoid the dangers of the feverish excitement which, if artificially induced, may impair the soundness of any decisions taken.

But the comparative merits of the two systems are not confined to the difference in the kinds of issues encouraged by them. Fixed times for elections, provided they are sufficiently far apart, have the advantage of enabling a Ministry to look forward to an uninterrupted period in which to work out the policy that it proposes to undertake. Viewed in this light, the comparison becomes one in which the advantages of efficiency in administration must be set against a more intelligent intervention of the people in politics.

§ 2. Formulation of issues

(a) The official Speech.

Until quite recently there has been no prospect of the decision of the people on questions of policy at general elections being facilitated by any recognized and uniform method of formulating issues. The electorate only became aware of the programmes of party leaders in an indirect or anomalous manner.

During some parts of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the King's and Queen's Speeches to Parliament, leading up to dissolutions, were regarded as the authoritative method of communicating the issues, not only to that assembly, but in some sense through it to the people.¹ Under William III the issues may be said to have been raised by the King himself, since he was in many respects his own chief Minister. But later on the King's Speech came to be regarded as, and was in fact, that of the Sovereign only in form: it was drawn up by the Ministry of the day, which was responsible for its terms. The intermediate or transitional stage seems to have occurred in the reign of Queen Anne. Swift observed that it was well known 'that Speeches on these occasions are ever digested by the advice of those who are in the chief confidence, and, consequently, that they are the sentiments of Her Majesty's Ministers, as well as her own'.² A further stage in the development of the Speech was commented upon by Wilkes in circumstances which are notorious. In the famous No. 45 of the North Briton in 1763, he asserted that, for many years past, the legislature' and the public had understood the King's Speech to be that of his Ministers; and there was quoted in support of his assertion the authority of Shippen in 1733, Pulteney in 1739, and Argyle and Carteret in 1740.³

Even as late as 1841 the Duke of Wellington criticized the form of the Queen's Speech on the ground that it appealed to the opinion of the people in regard to the fiscal question; and he charged the Ministry with having aggravated the case by permitting the Queen to make such a Speech. It is unlikely that many besides the Duke took this view of the position. The expression of it, however, led the Prime Minister (Melbourne) to explain that 'the Speech was that of her

¹ Cf. Chapter VIII, § 1, above, which includes several remarks about the King's Speech prior to dissolution of Parliament. The full text of the Speeches is easily available in 'Hansard'.

² The Examiner, No. 19, 30 Nov. to 9 Dec. 1710.

³ See The North Briton, Forty-six Numbers Complete (1772); 9 Parl. Hist. 88, 617, 630. Shippen advanced this view as early as 1717, 7 Parl. Hist. 508. See also the statement of Henry Fox in 1761, mentioned in Horace Walpole, Memoirs of George III (ed. Barker), vol. 1, p. 95. No. 45 of the North Briton, having characterized a passage in the Speech from the Throne as 'the most abandoned instance of ministerial effrontery ever attempted to be imposed on mankind', was consigned to the common hangman to be burned as a seditious libel.

Majesty's Ministers, and did not in any way, as the noble Duke said it would, commit the Sovereign to its sentiments'.¹ True as this statement was, Queen Victoria exercised a close supervision over the wording of the Speeches from the Throne; and in 1864 she insisted on the deletion of a paragraph on the ground that it was unduly bellicose in tone and might precipitate a war with Germany.²

During the period when the notion of issues being decided by the people was still in a rudimentary state, at the end, that is to say, of the seventeenth century, the arguments in support of party candidates (both of the Ministerial and the other side) could only be disseminated by such means as political tracts and periodical publications. This remained for many years the chief means available to the Opposition for raising issues.

But, from the time of the Proclamation leading up to the general election of November 1701, the Speech from the Throne (or Proclamation, as the case might be) became, for more than a century, the formal method of communicating such issues as the Sovereign or the Ministry wished to lay before the people. The communication was not only in form, but largely in fact, confined to Parliament. It was, however, open to candidates to repeat to the constituencies the issues disclosed in the Speech.

It has already been seen that the Proclamation of 1701 marked an interesting stage in the history of the development of the people's ability to decide issues.³ But, during the greater part of the eighteenth century, the absence of any effective issues meant that the formal communications of the Sovereign seldom contained any matter of concern to the voters at general elections. Not infrequently, in the middle of the century, the King's Speech which preceded the election contained no mention of any question of future policy, either because there was none to mention or because it was not desired to make any submission. In 1768, for instance, the following indefinite language was used: 'In the approaching election of representatives, I doubt not but my people will give me fresh proofs of their attachments to the true interest of their country, which I shall ever receive as the most acceptable mark of their affection to me.' This was no more than to ask for the support of the King's Ministers, because they were the King's Ministers. The omission of any more precise submission was possibly due to the temporary enlargement of royal influence.

¹ 59 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 77, 81.

² Queen Victoria's Letters, 2nd Series, vol. i, p. 154; Lord E. Fitzmaurice, Life of Lord Granville, vol. i, pp. 457-8.

³ See pp. 173-4 above.

Especial interest, however, attaches to the form of the Speeches of 1784 and 1831, since the elections which took place in those years are among the most important landmarks in the progress of popular government. In the former Speech the King was made to say: 'I feel it a duty I owe to the Constitution and to the country, in such a situation, to recur as speedily as possible to the sense of my people by calling a new Parliament.' In the latter:

'I have been induced to resort to this measure [the prorogation of Parliament with a view to its dissolution] for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of my people, in the way in which it can be constitutionally and authentically expressed, on the expediency of making such changes in the representation as circumstances may appear to require, and which, founded upon the acknowledged principles of the Constitution, may tend at once to uphold the just rights and prerogatives of the Crown, and to give security to the liberties of the people.'

The terms of the appeal to the people in the Speech of 1784 implied a new determinant capacity in the people. But, as has already been noticed, modern research has proved that the appeal was more a compliment than a reality, and was less genuine than has sometimes been supposed. The Speech of 1831, however, is distinguishable as containing an explicit reference to a particular subject of future policy.¹ Admittedly, the formal announcement only specified an issue which was, in the peculiar circumstances, in everybody's mouth. Nevertheless, the official recognition of the ability of the people to express 'constitutionally and authentically' their decision on the question of Reform marked not only an advance in the direction of democracy, but also a turning-point in the development of the methods of formulating issues.

(b) Addresses of party leaders.

From the time of Peel's Tamworth Manifesto of 1834 a change began to be noticeable. It was discovered that election campaigns, as a result of the widening of the franchise, required a larger measure of popular management.

¹ See pp. 201-2 above.

It was not sufficient to talk to the people through the channels of Parliament. Election addresses of political leaders were seen to be more effective than the official Speeches from the Throne. A few quotations from the Speeches themselves, of the middle of the nineteenth century and later, are sufficient to prove that they were no longer the vehicle by which the Ministry's message was conveyed.

It is true that, in the middle of the century, the disintegration of parties made clearness in the statement of issues difficult. But, even when the two-party system again asserted itself, although the Speeches contained a review of the legislation lately accomplished, the real points of controversy regarding future policy were rarely to be found in the formal announcement of the approaching prorogation or dissolution of Parliament.

The following passage, in the Speech of 1852, admirable though its sentiments are, might well have been omitted for the guidance it gave respecting the circumstances of the election: 'It is my earnest prayer that, in the exercise of the high functions which, according to our free Constitution, will devolve upon the several constituencies, they may be directed by an All-wise Providence to the selection of representatives whose wisdom and patriotism may aid me.'

So completely did the formal Speech cease to be important, that the wording of the Speeches of 1865 and 1880 must have led to the expectation that, as far as that part of the Speech dealing with issues was concerned, a stereotyped and meaningless form would be adopted. In 1865 it was said that

'the electors of the United Kingdom will soon be called upon again to choose their representatives in Parliament; and Her Majesty fervently prays that the Blessing of Almighty God may attend their proceedings and may guide them towards the attainment of the object of Her Majesty's constant solicitude—the welfare and happiness of Her people'.

And in 1880 this form was repeated, almost word for word.

In the election of 1874 no prospective issues of any kind were raised in the Speech. But some rather oblique reference was included, in the Speech of 1868, to the proposal of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, which was clearly understood to be the issue for decision. Mention was made of the expression of the people's opinion 'on those great questions of public policy which have occupied the attention of Parliament and remain undecided'. And since that date there have occasionally been references in the Speeches to real prospective issues to be raised in ensuing elections. In 1886, for instance, the general election was described in the Speech to have been arranged 'in order to ascertain the sense of my people upon the important proposal to establish a legislative body in Ireland for the management of Irish as distinguished from Imperial affairs'. And in 1923, when some degree of protection was proposed by the Conservatives, the Ministry was stated to be convinced that, 'unless measures for the safeguarding and development of the home market are adopted, no permanent improvement in their situation can be expected'. But, generally speaking, the leaders of the party in power prefer to state the issues of the election elsewhere than in the King's Speech. It has become realized that it is more effective to communicate directly with the country than through the channel of Parliament. Opposition parties nowadays find convenient means of notifying their programmes directly to the people; and Ministries are aware that they will be at a disadvantage unless they adopt equally direct methods.

Peel's action in issuing the Tamworth Manifesto in 1834 was a new departure in two respects. It was novel for the Conservatives to submit to the people questions of future policy, and it was likewise novel to use the leader's address to his constituency as the means by which to publish this submission to the electorate as a whole.

It was not long before the new arrangement superseded the old. Election addresses by leaders were soon treated as the recognized means of stating the party programme to the people. When Peel issued his second Tamworth Manifesto in 1847, the leader of the Protectionists also issued a manifesto-letter to his constituency, which was regarded as the statement of the protectionist policy; and, similarly, a published speech of Lord John Russell was accepted by the Liberals as their programme. Disraeli, in referring to the issues raised by the Liberals in 1865, quoted the Prime Minister's address to his constituents as that 'which in this country is looked upon as the programme or manifesto of a political party'.¹ This phraseology implies the use of a method which, although established, had only become so within a few years. In the election of 1868 it was fully understood that the party programmes were to be looked for in the election addresses of Gladstone and Disraeli.

¹ 183 Parl. Deb., 2 s., 76.

When party leaders were members of the House of Lords, it became necessary, owing to the impossibility of their using the election address as a manifesto, to devise some other means by which they could communicate with the people. This did not prove a very difficult matter. Lord Beaconsfield, in 1880, wrote an open letter to the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which was widely published and which acted as the alternative to an election address. Similar expedients have subsequently been used.

(c) Gladstone and the direct method.

Gladstone was the first frankly to admit the necessity of treating the whole country as one great political platform immediately before a general election, but not without a considerable amount of adverse criticism being directed at him for his demagogic tendencies. Political leaders had stumped the country more than a century before Gladstone. Pelham, in 1734, and the Duke of Newcastle, in 1747, for instance, had travelled round many constituencies, so as to influence the course of general elections. But it is unlikely that they entered at all fully into discussions of political prospects and policies; and it is certain that any pronouncements they made did not obtain a wide publicity.

Before the time of Gladstone, and even during his time, it was considered unusual, and even undignified, for leaders to make election speeches outside their own constituencies. Some earlier Ministers, like Canning, had taken the public into their confidence on aspects of politics and had made speeches to large numbers at times other than election times, fully intending their remarks to reach a wider audience through the instrumentality of the press. This kind of activity had little or no connexion with election campaigns or the decision of election issues.

Gladstone's first use of the direct method of appealing to the people seems to have been made in 1857. It was thus described by the Duke of Argyll:

'He entered upon one of those campaigns of speaking to the electors with which we all became familiar in later years, and which Disraeli cleverly called "pilgrimages of passion". I rather think they were novel in our Parliamentary habits. Prominent men, of course, have always made speeches to their own constituents, or elsewhere; but I rather think that Gladstone initiated the practice of setting out on a campaign of oratory, all over the country, for the purpose of influencing its decision. It struck me as very strange, and on the 5th of April I find myself writing to Aberdeen: "Gladstone has been making a speech in every town—every village—every cottage—everywhere where he had room to stand, and at Liverpool it was an avowed canvas for [Lord] Derby".¹

During the years 1862 to 1866 Gladstone was steadily building up and enlarging his popularity among the people. He visited industrial centres and received addresses from working-men. He toured Lancashire, conducting an agitation in favour of his Reform Bill. But these activities were not directly concerned with an election campaign. It was shortly before the election of 1880 that the charge was laid against him of 'bringing in a system of perpetual canvas, and removing the political centre of gravity from Parliament to the platform'.²

'Gladstone's Midlothian Campaign was, in form, a series of addresses to his own constituents, but the uniqueness of the occasion and the man, and the unprecedented audience . . . established a new conception, the conception of the democratic statesman appealing, over the head of Parliament, and beyond the range of his constituents, for a personal plebiscite, or mandate to rule the country. . . .'³

The words of Gladstone himself, in one of his concluding speeches in the Midlothian Campaign of 1879, are the best evidence of the speaker's own view of the object he had before him. He said that he wished 'to be enabled, in the face of a patriotic people, to make something like a detailed exposition of a difficult and complicated case . . . to be placed with unusual fulness before the people of the country for their consideration and decision'.⁴

This Midlothian Campaign had been fought when Gladstone was in Opposition. When, however, he had to make his great bid for a majority in favour of Home Rule in 1886, he was Prime Minister. But he did not hesitate to undertake a campaign involving a series of speeches in places outside his constituency. The Queen, who had never approved his 'oratorical crusades', felt it necessary to make a protest. The

¹ Eighth Duke of Argyll: An Autobiography, vol. ii, p. 75.

² Selborne's Memorials, Part II, section 1, p. 470.

³ D. C. Somervell, Disraeli and Gladstone, pp. 212-13.

⁴ Speeches in Scotland by W. E. Gladstone, vol. i, p. 211.

incident is interesting for the explanation it drew from Gladstone. He told the Queen that, 'since the death of Lord Beaconsfield, in fact since 1880, the leaders of the Opposition, Lord Salisbury and Lord Iddesleigh . . . have established a rule of what may be called popular agitation, by addressing public meetings from time to time at places where they were not connected'. This was the reason, he said, why he had 'deviated from his previous and, he believed, uniform practice'. He felt obliged to use all requisite means in order to place what he thought to be the true issue before the country.¹

Gladstone's implied tribute to the scrupulous propriety of Disraeli in these matters was amply justified. The biographers of Disraeli point out that, with few, if striking, exceptions, it was only in Parliament or in his constituency that he made political speeches.

'I have never in the course of my life', said Disraeli himself, 'obtruded myself upon any meeting of my fellow-countrymen unless I was locally connected with them, or there were peculiar circumstances which might vindicate me from the imputation of thrusting myself unnecessarily on their attention.'²

The fiction by which an address to the electors of a particular constituency has been in fact understood to be addressed to the electors of the whole country is one which proved convenient at a stage when the idea of submissions to the people had not become as fully accepted as it is to-day. The more straightforward method of making speeches to large audiences, intended for publication verbatim in the daily press, has more lately had a considerable vogue; and even this method has again been largely superseded by the publication in the press of official party manifestoes or programmes or by broadcast speeches to every elector desirous of hearing the issues explained by the party leaders. All these different methods have been used until very recently, though it seems that the use of a leader's election address to his constituency as a party manifesto will soon be discarded.

It was only a short move from Gladstone's practice of addressing the whole people, under the guise of speeches to his electors in Midlothian, to the elimination of the local aspect. An early step towards this elimination was taken, surprisingly enough, by Lord Salisbury in the election of 1892. It is true that, being a member of the House of Lords, he had no constituency to address; but he did not consider it necessary to adopt the expedient of Lord Beaconsfield in 1880, to which reference has been made, namely of addressing an open letter to a public figure. Lord Salisbury aroused some comment, in 1892, by addressing a manifesto 'to the electors of the United Kingdom'. As Prime Minister, he defined in this manifesto the issues upon which, in his opinion, the election would turn. After claiming credit for the record of the Conservatives in regard to social questions, he turned to the question of Home Rule for Ireland. The election, he said, was of 'terrible importance' to the Irish. 'On your votes', he told the whole body of the electors, 'will depend whether it will be to them a message of hope or a sentence of servitude and ruin. . . . It is for you to determine whether this rash experiment, this dangerous novelty, shall be tried.'

¹ J. Morley, Life of Gladstone, vol. iii, p. 344.

² Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli (new ed.), vol. ii, p. 521.

Some few years passed, however, before the direct method of placing issues before the people became general. In 1918 Mr. Lloyd George, jointly with Mr. Bonar Law, issued a coalition election manifesto addressed to the whole electorate. This manifesto gave direction to the election campaign. It is only proper to remark that the resumption of the direct address to the electorate was largely to be explained by the non-party character of the appeal. But since 1918 there has been an increasing tendency to eliminate the fiction by which addresses to particular constituencies or speeches to particular audiences were understood to be intended for the whole body of voters. Mr. Baldwin was one of the last of the party leaders to retain the use of the election address to his constituency as his means of announcing the programme of his party; but in 1929 he published a Message to Britain; and in 1931 he again adopted the more modern method and published in the press an election manifesto, addressed 'to the members of the Conservative and Unionist Party'.

Not only, then, is it no longer considered shocking for a political leader to make speeches at election time outside his constituency which are intended to be published throughout the whole country, but he may avowedly address a manifesto, outlining his party programme, to the whole electorate. As far back as Disraeli's time it began to be understood that a clear decision of the people at a general election should be accepted directly by the Ministry of the day, without the necessity of awaiting its confirmation in Parliament. It is only sensible, therefore, that, if the answer is given directly, the question should be put in the same way.

It remains to add that no development can do more to assist uniformity and clearness in the formulation of issues than that of broadcasting. Experience of its use has already been sufficient to justify the conclusion that appeals to the people by party leaders will be made less and less on a number of local platforms and more and more on one single national platform. But the full effect of broadcasting on the growth of democratic government in general is still a matter of conjecture.

(d) Particularity.

When measures come before the people at election time, the extent to which they are to decide upon the particular terms in which the legislation is to be enacted is often left uncertain. The course of practice has been irregular; and the opinions expressed on the subject have been diverse.

The concern of the Duke of Wellington at the submission to the people, in 1831, not merely of the general question of Reform, but of the particular terms of a measure of Reform, has already been mentioned.¹ It was observed at the time of the controversy on the great Reform Bill that the electors were requested, 'not to choose legislators, but to be legislators themselves'.² Although it was certainly the fact that the cry of 'the bill, the whole bill and nothing but the bill' implied that the people insisted on expressing their opinion in favour of a minimum increase in the franchise as well as on a general principle of Reform, it can hardly have been imagined that the electors were capable of forming a critical judgement on the wording of a complicated piece of legislation, containing eighty-two long clauses, some of which dealt with details of procedure.

Home Rule for Ireland, like Parliamentary reform, aroused feelings of such intense interest that it naturally prompted the question whether the submission to the people was in respect of a general policy or of particular terms. Gladstone, embarrassed by the difficulties of carrying such a measure, opposed the idea of particular submission. In a speech before the first general election at which Home Rule was specifically made an issue, he asked the question: 'What is the true issue? Is it . . . a choice between opposite policies in respect of Ireland . . . or is it a choice . . . upon the particulars of a large and complicated Bill?' He then, having expressed the view that the electors were excellent judges of policy, continued: 'It is a policy . . . upon which you are called to vote. It is not a detail, a particular, or even a Bill.'¹

¹ See p. 201 above.

² Annual Register, 1831 (Part I), p. 151.

Gladstone's Home Rule proposals continued to be a source of alarm to his opponents and of discomfort to his supporters. It did not become easier to find a scheme that was not open to searching criticism in an election contest. In the year following the election of 1892, the Government of Ireland Bill was before the House of Lords; the Duke of Devonshire (the Lord Hartington of the earlier Home Rule contests) did not abate his strenuous opposition; and he was naturally insistent that no Bill should be passed unless it was submitted, in terms, to the electorate. His speech in the House of Lords on the subject not only maintained the opposite opinion to that of Gladstone in regard to the extent of the submission to the people, but it also distinguished between issues that can be put in the form of a simple question and those that cannot be adequately appreciated unless outlined in the form of legislation.²

The controversies which arose in regard to the particularity of the submissions for the people's decision in regard to Reform and in regard to Home Rule lead to the conclusion that, where the question is capable of being put in a simple form allowing of a plain 'Yes' or 'No', the submission of the provisions of a legislative proposal may be unnecessary. But where the acceptability of a proposed legislative measure depends on its scope, then it is proper that some particulars of its intended form shall be submitted to the electorate for approval.

At the time when Conservative members of the House of Lords asserted that it was the duty of the Upper House to ensure that the Finance Bill of 1909 was not passed without the express assent of the people, it was argued by Lord Morley and Lord Courtney of Penwith that legislation of so complex a character was unsuitable for submission at a general election. The former remarked, in the debate on the second reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, that, 'if there is any one matter which cannot be usefully or wisely submitted to a plebiscite, it is a Budget. It is one of those things on which you cannot say, Yes or No'.¹ A motion was, however, carried to the effect 'that this House is not justified in giving assent to this Bill until it has been submitted to the judgment of the country'. And, although the issues before the people in the first election of 1910 proved, as was predicted by Liberal peers in the debate in the House of Lords at the end of 1909, to include other questions besides the Finance Bill, the terms of that Bill were among the submissions to the people on that occasion. No one would, however, suggest that the people were able to exercise more than a superficial judgement on the projects of the Bill. It was obvious that many of its technicalities were beyond the easy comprehension of the average elector.

¹ Speeches of W. E. Gladstone, vol. ix (1886-8), pp. 133-4.

² 17 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 30-1.

Some remarks have already been made on the difference of opinion between the Liberals and the Conservatives, in 1911, in regard to the particularity of the mandate obtained as a result of the submission at the second general election in 1910 on the question of the relations between the two Houses.² Soon after the assembly of the new Parliament, the Liberals maintained that, since the draft of the Parliament Bill had been made public prior to the election, and since they had obtained a majority, the people had decided in favour of the particular terms of the measure. Asquith asserted that 'the Bill, Preamble and Clauses' had been submitted to the people. Balfour, on the contrary, refused to admit that the people 'actually gave the Government a mandate for this particular way of dealing with' the constitutional question. He did not believe that, 'if you cross-examined the odd thousands of electors who returned the Government to power, you would find they could tell you exactly what this Bill is'. (This would make the contention of the Liberals dependent on a very high standard.)

When, however, the Parliament Bill was in the Committee stage in the House of Lords, Haldane no longer relied on a particular mandate in respect of its literal terms. He gave the House a disquisition on the working of the representative system in this country, and claimed that the Ministry had a general mandate to enact a statute carrying out the intentions of the people. He claimed that the electors, as a general rule, took a keen interest in the subject-matter of legislation of constitutional importance and that, when they have considered and approved the principles of a Bill proposed by a

¹ 4 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 1143.

² See pp. 232-4 above.

Ministry, they have done as much as they can be required to do.

'A general approval', he said, 'is given to the principles of the Bill, and the member representing the constituency is left to work out the details with the other representatives and the Government. The constituencies do not want to be consulted on every point that arises in the discussion in the House of Commons, and never express a wish that their representatives should come back and consult them upon details.'¹

It is obvious that, if the electors wished to take a hand in the detailed enactment of every statute, the process of legislation would become an impossible one. Even if they wished to concern themselves with the details of a large number of statutes, the representative system would become a farce. But in the absence of the use of the referendum, or unless some means are found of submitting proposals to the people in less indefinite terms than has hitherto been the practice, controversy will inevitably persist regarding the particularity of the mandates which are alleged to have been obtained. It is arguable that, when a certain stage of development in democratic government has been reached, the adoption of some arrangement similar to the referendum is the only alternative to recurrent disputes regarding the extent of the authorization of the legislature. One or two comparisons between the uncertain position in this country and the more rigid arrangements in countries using the referendum will be made in the next chapter.

¹ 8 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 678, 762; 24 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1056, 1111; 25 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1693; 9 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 214-15.

CHAPTER XII

CONCLUSIONS AND TENDENCIES

§ 1. Arguments for and against the referendum

THE absence of set rules, defining either the form in which submissions to the people should be made or the subjects which require to be submitted, renders hopeless any attempt at discovering precise principles regarding the extent of the people's power to take a part in government. One of the advantages claimed for the referendum is the explicit form in which questions can be put. Although it may be replied that there is no constant assurance, under a system of referendum, that attention is concentrated on the specified questions or that the form of the questions is unambiguous, the system certainly tends towards clearness and precision; whereas, under the usual general election conditions, issues put forward by different parties are left to find their level of importance in the most haphazard fashion.

There were frequent debates in Parliament on the comparative merits of the general election and the referendum at the period when the relations of the two Houses were under discussion in 1910 and 1911. On one occasion Balfour remarked: 'Whether the referendum be a good thing or a bad thing, at all events it is a decision of the people on a particular thing, but a general election, be it a good thing or a bad thing, is not the decision of the people on a particular measure.'¹ Curzon made the same point when he argued that 'the class of questions which go to the referendum would be much more easily put in a concise and compact shape, admitting of "aye" or "no", than are all the mixed and complicated issues that go before a general election.'²

It is easy to find examples of general elections in which a number of confused questions were placed before the people; but it is extremely difficult to find more than one or two elections in which a single issue or one or two clear issues have been raised. Balfour, at the same time that he made the remark quoted above, observed that, in the course of his long political career, he had no experience of an election in which there were not mixed issues. The only one of which he had heard that had one particular issue overriding all others was the election of 1831. He might, perhaps, have added the election of 1868, where the proposal for the disestablishment of the Irish Church was notably predominant.

¹ 21 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1752.

² 6 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 945.

The elections at the beginning of the present century, one and all, involved mixed issues. The 'khaki' election of 1900 can hardly be said to have had as its sole issue the question of the prosecution of the South African War.¹ In 1906 the questions of the modification of the Education Act of 1902, of a preferential tariff, and of Chinese Labour all played a considerable part. The first election of 1910 turned primarily on the powers of the House of Lords, especially in relation to the rejection of the Lloyd George Budget; but it also turned on the merits of that Budget and on proposed changes in the fiscal system. It would require a miracle, Balfour said, for a verdict of a general election to decide several questions at once, so that 'when the constituents choose Mr. X. rather than Mr. Y., or Mr. Y. rather than Mr. Z., they pronounce specifically and precisely upon a large number of utterly disconnected propositions, supported by arguments having no connection with each other, belonging to different departments of policy, and that, when they vote on all these points for Mr. X. or Mr. Y., they give a final and conclusive answer'.

Most of the leaders of the Liberal party and of the Labour party have opposed the introduction of the referendum; and, among their objections, they have protested that it is no more possible to isolate issues under a system of referendum than under the system at present in vogue in this country. In order to substantiate their allegations they have had to point to the experiences of foreign countries where the referendum is in use. Asquith, among others, expressed himself as feeling no doubt but that the referendum would fail to disentangle confused issues.

'The referendum', he said, 'might be nominally and ostensibly on some particular point; and everybody knows that the whole machinery of both parties in the State would be brought to bear on the determination of that issue. You would have the turmoil, the tumult, and a large part of the expense of a general election; and, while I have the highest possible respect for the intelligence and political insight of my fellow-countrymen, I do not believe it would be possible for them, under these conditions, completely to segregate the particular issue on which the referendum took place, and entirely to ignore the whole of the rest of the field of politics.¹

¹ Cf. Lord Salisbury, 8 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 783-4; and see p. 300 below.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald was able to state, from study of the working of the referendum in Switzerland, that there was no more definiteness under that system than with a general election. 'Our general elections', he remarked, 'have undoubtedly mixed issues, but the referendum has just as mixed issues, and in some cases even more complicated issues than those found at a generalelection.'² It is certainly true that the Swiss authorities on the subject do not seem to be agreed on the practicability of isolating issues under their system.³

Although the people are asked at a referendum to vote for or against a definite proposal, and although there is a fair chance of obtaining a clear answer, experience has shown that electorates find the greatest difficulty in dissociating themselves from allegiances to persons and parties. Even when both sides agree to isolate a particular question, it is found that other questions press themselves on the notice of the voters. In 1929 the Ministry in Australia was willing to accept a proposal of the Opposition that the Arbitration Abolition Bill should be submitted to the people at a general election, and that the submission should be treated in the nature of a referendum. When, however, the election came to be held, the fate of the Bill, although the main issue, proved not to be the sole issue on which votes were cast.

When the Conference on the Reform of the Second Chamber, presided over by Lord Bryce in 1918, considered the referendum as a means of disposing of controversies between the two Houses, one of the reasons for rejecting it was its supposed unsuitability to the conditions of a large country, like the United Kingdom, for different parts of which peculiar legislation is sometimes required. But this objection applies equally to the submission of issues at general elections. It has frequently happened that different sections of the people, local or functional, have each been interested in one in particular of several issues raised at an election. Each section has voted for or against the proposal with which it was specially concerned. In these circumstances, the sum totals of the votes for the different parties give very little indication regarding a decision on any of the issues.

¹ 15 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1174-5.

² 21 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1770.

³ See Felix Bonjour, La Démocratie suisse, translated under the title Real Democracy in Operation, and also Simon Deploige, Referendum in Switzerland.

The election of 1892 has been cited as an example of this state of affairs. The Welsh electors were interested primarily in the question of the disestablishment of the Welsh Church; the London electors in Municipal Reform; the agricultural labourers in parish councils; the town artisans in Employers' Liability; and the miners in the Eight Hours Bill. All these questions were raised by the Liberal Ministry; but it would have been a hopeless task for any one to draw any particular conclusions from the Liberal victory at the polls regarding a decision by the people on a question of policy. No single issue had been put; and it could not be convincingly maintained that the people had approved all the proposals, owing to the variety of interests concerned. Some sort of devolution is the best palliative for this kind of embarrassment to the working of the mandate principle.

The referendum has the undoubted advantage of enabling a submission to the people to be made upon occasions when it is most required and is most likely to be significant. Issues can be dealt with as they arise and are not so likely to be fabricated for party purposes. On the other hand, the referendum tends to direct attention to issues of policy to the exclusion of personal issues; and there is much to be said for a system which allows both these classes of issues to be determined by the people. If the referendum were introduced into this country, it is probable that the importance of general elections would be considerably diminished. There would be a tendency for the referendum to be regarded as so much superior to the general election for the purpose of submission of prospective issues that the general election would be confined to the determination of issues of a personal and retrospective character.

Whether the introduction of the referendum would diminish the importance of Parliament and the sense of responsibility of members is a question which has been fully discussed in recent years. On this subject, the opinion of constitutional authorities in countries where the referendum is operative is naturally of interest in regard to the effect on the position of their legislatures. M. Felix Bonjour, formerly President of the Swiss National Council, has expressed the clear opinion that the status of the legislature is rather enhanced than lowered.

'Far from diminishing the importance of parliamentary labours,' he has remarked, 'the referendum obliges members to prepare laws and decrees with the greatest possible care, and by imposing upon them the duty of justifying their work to the people, it helps to make them public men in the widest sense of the term; it adds to, rather than detracts from, the importance of their function.'¹

Decided views have been expressed in this country on both sides of the question. Lord Curzon, in the debates on the relations between the two Houses in 1910, put the alternatives in this way:

'What does the charge [that the referendum would destroy the sense of responsibility of the members of the House of Commons] mean? I suppose it means that members of Parliament would say "Never mind what we do, never mind what vote we give. The matter will be settled by the people, and therefore we may be indifferent". . . . It has had in Switzerland, and I believe it would have here, exactly the opposite effect. I myself believe that it would stimulate the sense of responsibility of individual members of Parliament, because they would feel that they might be called to account by a referendum of the people at no short date afterwards.'²

Asquith, on the other hand, when criticizing the Conservative proposals for the introduction of the referendum at the time of the conflict between the two Houses in 1911, foretold that the referendum would reduce a general election to a 'sham parade' and would 'degrade the House of Commons to the level of a talking club'.³

One of the reasons why the use of the referendum, for adjusting differences between the two Houses, was discarded by the Conference on the Reform of the Second Chamber in 1918 was that its use, when once introduced, 'could not be confined to the cases for which it was in this instance proposed', and 'that it might tend to lower the authority and dignity of Parliament'. And on various occasions, when the merits of the referendum have been debated in Parliament, it has been asserted that its adoption would imperil the principle of representative government. It is noteworthy, however, that few politicians have had the temerity to assert that the development of the referendal element in submissions to the people at general elections has interfered with the representative character of members of Parliament.

§ 2. The extent of the mandate

Various opinions are held regarding the proper limits of submissions to the people. On the one side, it is maintained that there can be no effective decision unless a single issue is raised. According to other opinions, it is possible for several issues to be determined at one election. Others, again, hold that general party programmes can be voted upon, so that authority may be given to proceed on the principles outlined by the party leaders. And there are even those who consider that, when a Ministry obtains a majority, it has a general commission to introduce whatever legislation it may deem requisite.

¹ F. Bonjour, Real Democracy in Operation (translation), p. 84.

² 6 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 946.

³ 21 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1751.

Shortly after the 'khaki' election of 1900 the Conservatives proceeded to introduce, and Parliament passed, legislation dealing with education and licensing. Many Liberals objected that the Conservatives merely had a mandate to finish the South African War and could not deal with other matters. Balfour took exception to the doctrine propounded by Campbell-Bannerman, to the effect that a Parliament which is elected when one subject is before the constituencies is incapable of dealing with other subjects, especially if they are of outstanding importance.¹ 'I believe', he said, 'that doctrine to be utterly wrong and unconstitutional.' In support of his contention, he cited the election of 1880 and stated that, although Gladstone obtained his majority, in so far as it was obtained on a positive issue, so as to enable him to deal with the question of the treatment of Christians in the near East, he did not hesitate to deal with the problems of personal liberty in Ireland, which suddenly presented themselves; and that no one criticized the fact that he dealt with those problems, however much they disapproved of the way he acted.² The example selected by Balfour does not appear to be a very cogent one, since the election of 1880 was decided almost entirely on retrospective issues, namely the past administration of the Beaconsfield Ministry. Nevertheless, it is true that it would be an excessively stringent principle for a Ministry to be disqualified from introducing more than one important piece of legislation during its whole period of office.

When the extent of the mandate of the people was being discussed in connexion with the Parliament Bill of 1911, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald characterized the notion that there could only be a single mandate at an election as a novel one.

¹ Campbell-Bannerman had, as a matter of fact, raised the issue of education in his election address in 1900; see The Times, 22 Sept. 1900.

² 132 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 1014-15; cf. 141 Parl. Deb., 4 s., 160-2, and 8 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 783-4.

He understood that 'the whole underlying assumption of representative government is that you can have a series of mandates given at the same time'. 'If', he said, 'it is going to be "one mandate, one general election"', then, of course, there should be no general elections at all, because you can never have only one mandate.¹

An intermediate view, which is probably that approved by the largest number of those who have concerned themselves with this question, and which certainly appears to have much to commend it, allows a Ministry to proceed to carry out a party programme outlined at an election and does not disable a Ministry from varying or adding to it, provided that no marked change in party principles is involved and no considerable change of a constitutional character undertaken which was not foreshadowed at the time when the last submission was made to the electorate.

The view that a Ministry which has obtained its majority can introduce whatever measures it pleases, whether included in a programme or not, may be described as that of the old Whig school. It was so claimed by Morley. When speaking on the subject of the Finance Bill in 1909, he, after denouncing the principle of mandate, which was then being vigorously promoted by the Conservatives, reminded the House of Lords that, on his Liberal colleagues objecting, in 1902, that the Conservatives had no mandate to pass the Education Bill, he formally dissociated himself from that objection.² And in the debate on the Parliament Bill in 1911 he reiterated his opinions. 'I have never', he said, 'assented to the idea that a Parliament is to be confined to a single great issue.' He went so far as to assert that, 'when a general election returned a Parliament, it entrusted power to Ministers to pass whatever Bills they thought fit'. In order to provide an example of a Ministry carrying through important proposals, which were not mentioned at the time of the election of Parliament, without any objection being made to the principle of so doing, he chose the election of 1868 and Gladstone's Ministry of the following years. This example is a particularly pertinent one, because, to all intents, the sole issue of the election was the proposal for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Nevertheless, as Morley pointed out, the singleness of the issue did not prevent the Gladstone Ministry introducing measures for the reform of land-tenure in Ireland, for the reform of the Army, and the reform of the Civil Service.

¹ 21 H.C. Deb., 5 s., 1767-8.

² 4 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 1142.

'These things', he remarked, 'were not in the minds of the electors. How could they be? Probably they were not even in the minds of the Ministers at the elections, but the electors did what I believe most electors would do. They returned a First Minister . . . to whom they were determined to give a chance of showing his . . . constructive ability, and they left it in his hands and in the hands of his colleagues. That is in my view the right theory of the result of a general election.'¹

When the indefinite language of many of the party programmes of the Victorian period is recollected, especially that of Disraeli,² it would seem that the difference between the opinion that a Ministry can do anything that comes within its programme and the opinion that it can do whatever it likes may be a very fine one. But it would certainly not be fair to allow the vagueness of a programme to justify a wide interpretation of the extent of the authority to undertake legislation.

§ 3. The degree of authority

Some supporters of the principle, that a Ministry is not confined to measures which have been specifically raised as issues, have been willing to admit that a general mandate given at an election is more authentic in the earlier years of a Parliament's period than in the later; that a new measure of importance is more easily admitted to be within a general mandate when a Ministry is comparatively fresh from the polls than when a Parliament is approaching the end of its term.

Lord Salisbury's objection to the Bill for introducing the Ballot in 1872, to which reference has already been made,³ is a typical example of the allegation that a Ministry's commission is so stale that it ought not to undertake important legislation of a fresh character without express authority from the people. Lord Salisbury asserted that, as the Parliament of 1872 was four years old, the issues on which it was elected were obsolete and that, so far from having authority to legislate in regard to the Ballot, the Ministry had, as a body, been opposed to legislation on this subject at the time it was first formed.

¹ 8 H.L. Deb., 5 s., 700-1.

² See, for example, his election address of 1852, quoted in Monypenny and Buckle, Life of Disraeli (new ed.), vol. i, p. 1186.

³ See p. 219 above.

The attribution of a higher degree of authority to a mandate which is recent in date was naturally approved by the Liberals in the difficult situation in which they were placed in 1910. Their important legislative proposals had been rejected by the House of Lords; and some means had to be found of avoiding future deadlocks. The Liberals, therefore, proposed to include in the terms of the Parliament Bill a provision that, broadly speaking, any measure passed by the House of Commons within two years of an election should become law, even though rejected by the House of Lords. Asquith told the House of Commons that

‘there is a strong, nay, almost irresistible presumption that a measure passed by a majority of the House of Commons still fresh, or relatively fresh, from the polls is a measure which is approved in its main principles by the majority of the people, and which, therefore, in accordance with the principle of democratic government, ought to be allowed to pass into law’.¹

The Conservatives were able to point with some effect to the change in the Liberal attitude from that adopted by them in 1902 to that adopted in 1911. They reminded the Liberals, in the course of the debates on the Parliament Bill, that the Conservative Education Act of 1902, for which the Liberals had alleged there was no mandate, was passed within two years of the general election of 1900. If the Liberals had then held their opinions regarding the efficacy of mandates of recent date, they would not have been able to look askance at the Conservatives for exceeding their authority.

§ 4. Illogicalities

Many important questions of policy are settled without any complaint being raised that the people have not been consulted. How is it, then, that in respect of some measures a mandate is expected, and in respect of others of equal or greater intrinsic importance it is not?

Some consideration has been given in this country to the desirability of defining the classes of measures which require the express mandate of the people before being introduced. Proposals for altering the position of and succession to the Crown were selected, during the debates on the Parliament

¹ 15 H.C. Deb., 53, 1179.

Bill of 1911, as those which should be included. Steps have been taken in foreign countries to specify in formal Constitutions the matters requiring submission by referendum. Many of these Constitutions forbid any amendment to their terms without a plebiscite. On the other hand, the Constitution of the Estonian Republic, for instance, provides that certain matters, such as taxation and the declaration of war, may not be submitted to a referendum.

Measures of importance have frequently been undertaken in this country without any previous reference to the people, where, for example, the safety of the State would have been endangered by publicity or by delay or where the subject was one of too great complexity or technicality to be appreciated by the ordinary voter.

Foreign policy is generally beyond the scope of and unsuitable to popular decision. On more than one occasion Gladstone withstood the pressure even of members of Parliament to be kept conversant with treaty negotiations, on the ground that the ultimate interests of the nation might be prejudiced by disclosure. Lansdowne's important steps in foreign policy between 1902 and 1904, especially in regard to Anglo-Japanese and Anglo-French relations, were taken entirely on the responsibility of the Ministry. England entered the Great War of 1914-18 without more than an assumption that public opinion was in favour of that course; it was certainly impossible to wait for a formal reference. The peace terms of 1919 were as important to the nation as the entry into the War; but the questions for decision were far too abstruse for the comprehension of the people, as also were undertakings like those comprised in the Treaty of Locarno.

As regards matters of internal and constitutional interest, recent alterations in the law relating to rating, local government, and poor law have been made without any specific authority from the people, and without any protests respecting the absence of that authority. It is obvious that legislation involving technicalities of administration is inappropriate for framing as an election issue. Subjects like these are essentially of a kind upon which the people can give only a retrospective opinion, if any at all. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has observed that the large majority of legislative proposals involve too many problems to be settled by a simple yea or nay. In his opinion, fundamental issues of a general character, like the principle of nationalization of mines or railways, are capable of being settled by a popular vote, though, even in regard to them, he has remarked, the discussion of details of machinery tends to obtrude itself with not only confusing, but with conservative results. The main question is apt to become obscured by secondary and unessential points, which engage the attention of large sections of the people, with the result that the purpose of the original plan is lost sight of.¹

The Representation of the People Act, 1918, which enacted a larger increase in the franchise than any previously made in England, produced so vast a change in the Constitution that it is difficult to imagine one that could be more vast, unless of a revolutionary character. It may be supposed that no reference was made to the people respecting this matter, because the answer was regarded as being so much a foregone conclusion that it would have been altogether absurd to have put the question.² In the earlier instances of extending the franchise, there may have been some doubt concerning the opinions of the electorate. Ministries of the middle of the nineteenth century certainly acted as if this was so. But, nowadays, it seems to be assumed that any offer of supposed benefits or advantages will be snapped at by the voters, who are imagined to be eager to accept all that may be offered to them.

While the absence of any popular control over the introduction of large classes of legislative and other measures may require explanation, it must be borne in mind that public opinion has a close bearing on the shaping of a considerable proportion of the legislative output. A few remarks on this subject have been made in Chapter III of this book, where notice has also been given to the steps which are taken nowadays to ensure that the views of interested persons and bodies are obtained and considered, both in respect of Acts of Parliament and also of the rules and regulations made by Government Departments in pursuance of powers conferred on them by statute. As regards the future, there seems to be no reason why means cannot be devised, in suitable instances, for the fuller consideration of legislative proposals at general elections through the official publication of impartial summaries.

¹ J. Ramsay MacDonald, Socialism, Critical and Constructive (revised ed.), p. 220.

² Cf. p. 4 above.

§ 5. Accurate representation or effective decision

The arrangement, by which the results of voting at a general election are interpreted as a decision by the people on questions of policy or, at the least, on the choice of a Ministry, depends to a very large degree on a combination of a straightforward working of the two-party system with single-member constituencies. If one of the two parties obtains a clear majority, there is a possibility of definite decisions by the people being inferred. It is obvious that, under this kind of arrangement, there cannot be an accurate representation of every shade of political opinion. The representation is rough and ready, and the majority for one side or the other is apt to be exaggerated.¹ On the other hand, under a system of groups rather than parties, or a system like that of proportional representation, which is necessarily accompanied by a number of parties representing many shades of political opinion, voters can in all probability select candidates who reflect their own particular views; but that is the limit of their capacity.

It is a question which of the advantages is preferable. A general election may produce a Parliament that accurately mirrors the various shades of opinion prevalent among the electorate. Such an election will not provide any intelligible answer regarding matters of policy or even settle the choice between two alternative Ministries. Contrariwise, a general election that provides some opportunity of inferring decisions by the people as a whole will only produce a Parliament that reflects the opinions of the electorate broadly and approximately.

The French political system, in which there are many groups, and no very large parties, produces accurate representation (or may be capable of doing so) at the expense of effective decision by the electors. The people may choose between the programmes of different groups; but none of these programmes can be carried out in its entirety. The strongest group is always in a minority; and every Ministry is a coalition Ministry. The result of the voting can involve no more than the adoption of general principles. It cannot lead to the undertaking of a complete party policy.

¹ It is not always realized that an exaggerated majority, due to the use of single-member constituencies, may often prove an aid to stable government, and that it can fairly be regarded as an advantage rather than an anomaly.

Even in this country, where the party system, and not the group system, prevails, the result of a general election becomes ambiguous or, at the best, merely negative on the advent of a third party. In spite of there being a predominant issue in an election, it may well prove that a Ministry which takes office without a clear majority over the other two parties is unable to claim a mandate to pursue a particular policy. In the election of 1929, for instance, when 280 Labour, 260 Conservative, and 57 Liberal members were returned, it was not possible to draw any positive conclusions from the voting; and even the negative conclusions were not very evident.

Among the considerable discussions which have been devoted to the characteristics and possibilities of proportional representation and the alternative vote, some attention has been paid to the effect which these systems might have on the people's capacity to make decisions at general elections. A short reference was made to this aspect in the Report of the Royal Commission on Electoral Systems of 1910, in the following terms:

'On the question whether the representation of all parties in proportion to their voting strength is in itself desirable, we may point out that it is not a fair argument against the present system that it fails to produce such a result, because it does not profess to do so. A general election is in fact considered by a large portion of the electorate of this country as practically a referendum on the question which of two Governments shall be returned to power. The view may be right or wrong, but it has to be taken account of in any discussion which turns on the composition of the House of Commons.'¹

Systems like that of proportional representation succeed in enabling voters to pick out from a list of candidates one who accurately represents their particular shade of political opinion; and they have other advantages as well. But these systems inevitably diminish the influence of the people as a whole on the policy and choice of Governments. The numerous parties or groups which are the usual accompaniment of proportional representation are certain frequently to reassert themselves. New alliances involve new Ministries; and large changes in the composition of Ministries often follow one another without any general election and without the people having any opportunity to indicate the

¹ Cd. 5163 of 1910, para. 126.

Ministry of their choice or the policy or programme which they prefer.¹

If it were part of the object of this book to forecast the future, the opinion might be hazarded that there would be a greater likelihood of the introduction of the referendum, if proportional representation or the alternative vote were adopted, than there is under the present arrangements, for there would be a strong current of opinion in favour of the people retaining at least as large a capacity of directly influencing the course of government as they have at present; and they would undoubtedly tend to be worse off in this respect, if proportional representation or the alternative vote were introduced unaccompanied by the referendum.

§ 6. The capacity of the people

Some of the remarks made in the preceding sections of this chapter naturally provoke the question—are the people capable of understanding and dealing with more than the simplest problems of government? Nearly three hundred years ago, James Harrington included among his political aphorisms one to the effect that the people cannot see, but can feel. This estimate was accepted by Prince Albert, when he said, following closely Harrington's phraseology, that 'the masses on which popular government rests only feel and do not think'. This remark was perhaps an ill-advised one for a person in Prince Albert's position to make at a time when democracy was beginning to make considerable strides. But a similar distrust of the political capacity of the people has been expressed by distinguished thinkers of as diverse types as Carlyle and J. S. Mill, both of them, nevertheless, having a real sympathy for popular aspirations.

Before the middle of the eighteenth century Montesquieu, in his Esprit des Lois,² drew a distinction between the ability of the people to judge of past facts and the comparative merits of rulers, on the one hand, and of questions of policy, on the other.

'The people', he said, 'are extremely well qualified for choosing those whom they are to entrust with part of their authority.

¹ In the recurrent controversies in France on the comparative merits of scrutin d'arrondissement and scrutin de liste the arguments for the former are comparable with those in support of the present system in this country; and the arguments for the latter correspond to some extent with those in favour of proportional representation.

² Book 2, chapter 2.

... But are they capable of conducting an intricate affair, of seizing and improving the opportunity and critical moment of action? No; this surpasses their abilities.'

And Burke, whose general opinion of the political capacity of the people is well known, followed Montesquieu, in this as in some other respects, by drawing the same distinction. Burke admitted that the English people were capable, not only of judging public men, but also of judging 'whether the main drift of their councils, for any series of years, was wise or foolish, and whether things went well or ill in their hands'.¹ But his speeches and writings yield many instances of his poor opinion of the people in the sphere of constructive politics.

A recent estimate of Dr. A. F. Pollard is strikingly consonant with those of Montesquieu and Burke; and it certainly cannot be said that he adopts a narrow or prejudiced view of the ultimate possibilities of the people's part in government, since he holds that 'the increase of popular education automatically widens the legitimate sphere of popular judgment', and he sees no reason why, when the people are able to understand the conditions of foreign policy, they should not claim its control—a stage the arrival of which seems to be very remote. In spite, however, of these evidences of goodwill towards the extension of democracy, Dr. Pollard's general conclusion on the present capacity of the people is markedly restrained. After observing that 'it is only the crudest of doctrinaires who think that the people can govern themselves in the sense of administering their own complicated affairs', he concludes that 'the best the public can do is to judge of the work that is done in its service without attempting to do the work of its servants. It is not a bad judge of the effects of legislation and government because it is the public which feels them; and, as Washington said, the people must feel before they can see. They are not, however, good judges of legislative proposals, because to foresee effects requires a natural imagination combined with expert political intelligence'.²

One of the disabilities sometimes attributed to the people is that of being short-sighted; they are apt to concentrate their attention on the advantages of immediate benefits without weighing the future risks. This imputation has been put in its extreme form by Sidney Smith, who remarked: 'The people are the best judges of their immediate gratifications and the worst judges of what would best conduce to their interests for a series of years.' Similar sentiments were very generally expressed about the time of the debates on the great Reform Bill, especially by Peel, who frequently argued that the precipitate demands of the people should not necessarily be satisfied, and that the people themselves would be the first to blame an ill-considered compliance with their importunity.

¹ To a Member of the Bell Club at Bristol, 31 Oct. 1779.

² A. F. Pollard, The Evolution of Parliament, 2nd ed., pp. 346-9.

As has been noticed in the preceding chapter, it is perfectly true that the people do not and, indeed, cannot themselves produce constructive proposals. These come either from the party leaders or from individuals or associations, who are in a position to bring them into prominence. But the inability of the people to make proposals does not involve their inability to judge of the merits of proposals; and it is undoubtedly arguable that the people are able to form a sound opinion on some of the simpler questions of future policy.

A rash remark of Gladstone, to the effect that the people are 'excellent judges of policy',¹ has already been quoted—a sweeping assertion which few would endorse. But more sober opinions of a liberal trend encourage the hope that there is a sphere, though a limited one, in which the people are capable of judging of the advisability of proposed legislation.

'The masses', said Bryce, for example, 'cannot have either the leisure or the capacity for investigating the underlying principles of policy, or for mastering the details of legislation. Yet they may—so our optimist must hope—attain to a sound perception of the main and broad issues of national and international policy, especially in their moral aspects—a perception sufficient to enable them to keep the nation's action upon right lines.'²

The view of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald seems to be that the votes of the people are best interpreted as displaying confidence or lack of confidence in a Ministry. 'The power of censuring a Government ought to be held by the electors', he has said. But, although he emphasized the incapacity of the people to act as legislators, he does not appear to wish to exclude them from the decision of general outlines of policy.³

¹ See p. 292 above.

² Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence, vol. ii, p. 31.

³ J. Ramsay MacDonald, Socialism, Critical and Constructive (revised ed.), p. 221.

Mr. and Mrs. Webb, in their book on Industrial Democracy, have maintained that the proper function of democracy is to 'assent to results', in contradistinction to a system of referendum which provides for 'assent to projects'. Trade union experience has, they say, amply proved the inadvisability of using the referendum in respect of complicated issues, and has led to the gradual limitation of its use to a few special questions in particular emergencies.¹

It may be hoped that the effectiveness of the people's decisions on simple questions will not be imperilled by attempts to thrust upon them the function of dealing with proposals of future policy, the results of which are beyond their capacity to estimate. A large increase in the extent of submissions to the people regarding future policy must diminish either the usefulness or the opportunities of deciding retrospective and personal issues. There seems to be a risk, in these circumstances, of some of the more valuable qualities of popular decision being left unexercised. At the same time, a strict exclusion of the people from all decisions in regard to future policy would make their position approximate to that prescribed by the Legalist School in China, which sardonically allows the people a share in what is already accomplished, but does not admit them to consultation in any new proposals. It may well be that the system adopted in this country, which includes a principle of mandate of an elastic character, will prove, if wisely developed, to be superior both to the rigid systems under which the referendum involves the people in detailed questions of legislative policy and to those under which the people are strictly confined to retrospective judgements.

¹ Sidney and Beatrice Webb, Industrial Democracy (1920 ed.), pp. 36, 60. On the preference of electorates in the U.S.A. for simple issues, see an article by Waldo Schumacher, entitled 'Thirty Years of the People's Rule in Oregon: An Analysis', 47 Political Science Quarterly, p. 242.

APPENDIX I

'The people'

It has been remarked, with great authority, that 'the "people" is so indeterminate an expression that its use, let alone its abuse, obscures almost all political discussion'.¹ An even more absolute indictment is that of Disraeli, who once said that, as a political expression, 'the people' is 'sheer nonsense'. He regarded it as belonging rather to the realm of natural history than to that of politics.² It was, however, only a few years after making these observations that Disraeli introduced a Bill into the House of Commons 'to amend the representation of the people', without perhaps considering whether the term 'people' in the title of the Bill referred to the electorate or the whole population.

The ambiguities of the present day are fewer than they were before democracy had become a generally accepted principle. Now that the qualification for the franchise is practically that of being an adult, many embarrassments in the use of the expression are removed. Nevertheless the mention of one or two incidents illustrative of earlier ambiguities will help to point the contrast between the past and the present.

Discrimination between the whole population of a State and what used to be known as the commonalty, populace, or masses had its counterpart in the terminology of many centuries ago. The Romans drew a distinction between the class which comprised the whole of the citizens and the class which comprised the citizens without the patricians; and separate words were adopted to describe these two classes. Equivalent expressions have recurred in European countries during medieval times. The result of these early complexities was that, when the introduction of democratic government raised problems requiring the use of accurate terms, the significance of 'the people' was found to be uncertain.

Only a little more than a hundred years ago, Canning protested against members of Parliament speaking of 'the people' in contradistinction to the whole of the citizens. He regarded the people as incomplete without the aristocracy and gentry. Nowadays this protest would hardly be necessary, since the aristocracy and gentry are so diminished as a political force that it is extremely unlikely that it would occur to any one to exclude them. The decrease in the old class distinctions has, in fact, largely helped to dissipate opportunities for confusion in meaning.

Before democratic government had become firmly established, politicians of various shades of opinion used the expression 'the people' to describe the class which they wished to be regarded as dominant. The expression was applied to some large portion of the nation which was not sovereign in fact, but to which, in the opinion of the user, sovereignty ought to be transferred or secured.¹ At the beginning of the eighteenth century, for instance, Swift and Defoe both contended that political rights should be confined to freeholders. Swift asserted that 'law in a free country is, or ought to be, the determination of those who have property in land'; and Defoe, in speaking of the 'right of the People', thus qualified his remarks: 'I would be understood of the freeholders, for all the other inhabitants live upon sufferance, . . . and have no title to their living in England, other than as servants.'

¹ A. F. Pollard, Evolution of Parliament, 2nd ed., p. 343.

² The Spirit of Whiggism (1836); cf. a speech by him in 1866 in which he characterized 'the people' as 'a mere indiscriminate multitude' (183 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 103); and see his articles in the Morning Post for 26 Aug. and 2 Sept. 1835.

Henry Fox, in the middle of the eighteenth century, is reported as having observed in the House of Commons that, 'when we talk of people with regard to elections, we ought to think only of those of the better sort'. The report is not unimpeachable; but, if Fox did not use these precise words, it is undeniable that they may be taken as a characteristic exposition of the views of his kind.²

Towards the end of his career, Burke indulged in a mathematical estimate of that section of the inhabitants which was capable of dealing intelligently with political questions. This body he regarded as truly entitled to the description of 'the people'. 'I have often endeavoured', he said, 'to compute and to class those who, in any political view, are to be called the people. . . . In England and Scotland, I compute that those of adult age, not declining in life, of tolerable leisure for such discussions, and of some means of information, more or less, and who are above menial dependence (or what virtually is such) may amount to about four hundred thousand.'³ The chief point of interest in this passage is not, perhaps, in the figure estimated by Burke, but rather in the acceptance of the qualification of intelligence as that which entitled citizens to play a part in politics.

It became more apparent in the early nineteenth century that the claim to political predominance could no longer be put forward on behalf of landowners or of aristocrats in the narrow sense of that expression. It was advanced on behalf of the more instructed, or, as Canning described them, 'that sound and sober majority of the nation—that bulk and body of the community which are truly and legitimately the people'. Brougham, in the earlier part of his career, was impressed by 'the necessity in the present times of looking more than formerly may have been essential to the body of the people out of doors, meaning by people the well-informed and weighty parts of the community'.⁴ Later

¹ John Austin, A Plea for the Constitution, p. 10 n.

² 12 Parl. Hist. 463.

³ First Letter on Regicide Peace.

⁴ Cf. A. Aspinall, Lord Brougham and the Whig Party, p. 82.

in his career, when speaking in support of the great Reform Bill in 1831, his interpretation was a little different. When discussing the attitude of the people towards the Bill, he said: 'I do not mean the populace—the mob: I have never bowed to them, though I never have testified any unbecoming contempt of them. . . . But, if there is a mob, there is the people also. I speak now of the middle classes—of those hundreds of thousands of respectable persons—the most numerous, and by far the most wealthy of the community.'¹

At the time of the first Reform Bill, the expression 'the people' was generally used to describe what were then known as the lower classes, as well as the middle classes; but, as a result of the enlargement of the franchise effected by recent statutes, it is impossible for there to be more than two opinions at the present day regarding the meaning to be given to the expression. Either it means all the inhabitants, or it means the electorate. The latter is the meaning adopted by the New English Dictionary, where, under the sub-head 'politics', 'the people' is defined as 'the whole body of enfranchised or qualified citizens, considered as the source of power; especially in a democratic State, the electorate'. If this definition is accepted, some other term will be required to designate the inhabitants as a whole, regarded as a class having political rights, even though these rights be passive rather than active.

The distinction between these two meanings was emphasized in a peculiar way by Siéyès at the beginning of the French Revolution of 1789. He was the first person to draw attention in explicit terms to a division into active and passive citizens. The former he described as having political rights, the latter as having merely natural rights. 'All the inhabitants of a country', he said, 'should enjoy therein the rights of a passive citizen; all have a right to the protection of their persons, their property, their liberty and so on; but all have not the right to take part in the formation of public authority; all are not active citizens.'²

At the present day the preponderance, among adults, of active over passive citizens in this country is large. The existence of the latter class does not raise any important problems. It is no longer necessary, as it was two hundred years ago, for liberal-minded persons to make protests on behalf of large sections of the inhabitants, who have no direct representation and no efficient means of making their views known on public matters or of seeking redress in respect of general grievances. But the one remaining ambiguity in the use of the expression 'the people' is sometimes liable to cause inconvenience. Bryce, in his monumental work on Modern Democracies, asked: 'Does it [the term "people"] in any given country cover, or ought it to cover, the whole population or only those who are legally citizens, i.e. entitled to share in the government by expressing their mind and will on public questions?'¹ And he did not seem to supply an answer to that question.

¹ 8 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 251. Peel, voicing the Conservative interpretation of 'the people', denied that the expression, as used in the Bill, corresponded with the earlier meaning, namely 'the great corporate bodies, and those great classes of the community to whom the franchise was intrusted' (5 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 114–15). On another occasion in 1831 Peel criticized his opponents for talking of the people as if they were to be numbered by heads and for forgetting the influence of wealth and education (3 Parl. Deb., 3 s., 1774).

² Aulard, French Revolution (translation), vol. i, p. 181. Although Siéyès drew fresh attention to the distinction between the two kinds of rights, their existence had given rise to discussion in England many years earlier. See, for instance, passages in the preface of the famous tract Jura Populi Anglicani (1701) and The Craftsman, 6 July 1794.

One way of evading the difficulty would be to use the term 'electorate', clumsy though it is, to designate the enfranchised and to use the term 'people' to refer to the whole population. Speeches of statesmen and even writings of political scientists frequently contain references to 'the nation', 'the community', 'the public', and 'the country', as alternatives to the terms already mentioned. But one expression is often as good as another; and it is only occasionally that exact terminology is requisite.²

¹ Vol. i, p. 162.

² In one at least of the modern continental Constitutions endeavour has been made to provide an accurate definition of the distinction between the whole of the inhabitants and that part which is qualified to elect representatives. The Constitution of the Estonian Republic provides that the people exercises supreme power through the instrumentality of the citizens who have the right to vote. This appears to be the sensible way of resolving the matter. All the inhabitants of a State enjoy certain elementary rights of protection; and these rights are to be assured to them by indirect representation. It might be said that they are virtually represented; but 'virtual representation' is a phrase which, as noticed on pp. 191-2 above, has rather unfortunate associations. The distinction, it may be added, has not been insisted upon in the Estonian Constitution because of any large disparity between the numbers of the enfranchised and the unenfranchised. The voting qualification is as wide as any can reasonably be. But, if a written Constitution is to comprise a scientific analysis of the distribution of sovereign power, a provision of the kind which has been mentioned appears not only to be justified but to be useful.

APPENDIX 11

Seasonable and Healing Instructions humbly tendered to the Freeholders, Citizens and Burgesses, of the respective Counties, Cities and Boroughs of England and Wales, to be seriously recommended by them, to their respective Knights, Citizens and Burgesses, elected and to be elected for the next Parliament. [British Museum, 669 f. 24 (34); Bodleian Library, 13 0 79 (71)—probably printed in March 1660.]

WE the Freeholders, Citizens, Burgesses, Commons and Freemen of the respective Counties, Cities, and Boroughs of England and Wales, taking into our serious Considerations the many late various Forms and Revolutions of our publick Government, with the miserable Distractions and Oppressions of our ruined Churches and Realms since the violent changes of our antient established Kingly Government, and Constitution of Parliaments, consisting of King, Lords and Commons, by whose united Counsels and Interests we were happily secured against all treacherous Plots and Conspiracies of forein Enemies and pernicious Domestick Vipers, and advanced to the highest degree of worldly Peace, Prosperity and Felicity. And finding by above eleven years sad Experience, that there is neither Hope nor Probability of restoring our 3. shipwrack'd Nations to their Pristine Tranquillity, Unity, Wealth, Honour, Traffick, Security, but by a speedy Restitution of our antient Form of Parliaments, and publick Regal Government; and with all observing, that in the Writs of Summons now issued for a Parliament to be held at Westminster, on the 25th day of April next, there is no known single Chief Governor, nor yet any real Commissioners nominated, but only Fictitious Utopian Keepers of the Liberties of England, with whom the Members appearing in Parliament can neither conferr nor consult, concerning the difficult and urgent Affairs either of the Realm or Church of England; And that all the Lords and Great Men of the Realm (the antientest hereditary Members of Parliament, the Grand Councillors of the Kingdom, and Chiefest Assertors of our Liberties in all precedent times) are totally omitted out of these new forms of Writs, and all Clauses in them, contrary to all former Presidents without whose concurrent Advice and Assistance with the Commons House in this approaching Parliament, no firm Peace or Settlement can probably be expected, a full and free English Parliament, (from which no legal Members, much lesse the whole English Peerage and Nobility ought to be excluded) being the principal thing the generality of this Nation lately petitioned and declared for, as the only Instrument under God to compose all Differences and dissenting Parties, and put a happy period to our manifold long-lasting Distractions and Confusions: Have thereupon apprehended it our bounden Duty, seriously to recommend these ensuing INSTRUCTIONS to our respective Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses elected, and to be elected and returned by us for our Representatives and Trustees in this approaching Parliament, who receiving full and sufficient Power for themselves, and their respective commonalties of the said Counties, Cities and Boroughs from the said commonalties alone who elect them, to do and consent to all such things as shall be ordained by the Common Council of the Realm in the said Parliament, in their Rights and Behalfs, are thereby obliged in point of Duty and Conscience as their publick servants and Proxies, vigorously to pursue all such just Prescriptions for the Common Welfare and Establishment of our Native Country, as they shall present unto them.

We therefore earnestly desire and require them in pursuance of the Trust reposed by us in them, to improve their uttermost Endeavours and Counsels (there being no particulars prescribed to them in the Writs themselves, as heretofore) to effect these few Individuells.

1. To restore the antient Constitution, Rights, Privileges and Freedom of our English Parliaments, their respective Houses and Members, and to preserve them from all future Mutulations and Violations by armed Force or otherwise, that so they may by free uninterrupted and combined counsels proceed to the speedy settlement of our distracted Churches and Nations, without any Diversions or Obstructions by Souldiers or popular Tumults.

2. To re-establish the antient Fundamental Regal Government of this Kingdom, and the Dominions thereunto belonging (under which we and our Ancestors in former Ages have flourished in great Peace and Prosperity) according to our known Laws, Oaths, Protestations, Covenants, and multiplyed Declarations, and secure it against all future Underminings and Powder-plots of Jesuitical and Fanatick Conspirators.

3. To revive and ratifie the miserably subverted and violated great Charters, Fundamental Laws and Statutes of the Land, made for the preservation of the Persons, Lives, Liberties, Freeholds, Estates, and Properties of all English Freemen, against all Arbitrary and Tyrannycal Judicatures, High Courts of Justice, Proceedings, Tryals, Executions, Judgements, Banishments, Imprisonments, Confinements, Confiscations, Forfeitures, Attainders, Outlawries, Sequestrations, illegal Taxes, Impositions, Excises, and public Charges whatsoever, not granted by the Common consent in Parliament, and to prevent all future subversions, Contempts and Violations of them, after so vast expences of Treasure and Bloud for their just defence.

4. To establish an able, learned, Orthodox Ministry, and just and righteous Magistracy throughout our Dominions, and to take special care that the Gospel of Christ may be duly and sincerely preached, propagated, the Sacraments and publike justice freely and rightly administered in all places, without neglect or obstruction, to the consolation, protection of all good Christians, and well doers, and the terror and suppression of all Malefactors.

5. To advance all sorts of Trade, Merchandize, and Navigation, by diminishing all excessive Customs, Excises, Imposts at home, by making Peace and holding good correspondence with all forein Kings and Nations abroad, and using all other good means conducing thereto.

6. To redresse all publick Grievances, Oppressions, Frauds, Misdemeanours; to retrench and regulate all exorbitant Taxes, Excises, Imposts, Fees, Extortions, Salaries, superfluous Forces, Garrisons, Officers (civil or military) by Land and Sea, for the peoples ease.

7. To procure a speedy, honourable, safe, Christian Treaty and accord with our long Exiled Protestant King, and Royal posterity, upon moderate, just, righteous terms and Propositions on either side, whereby the bleeding Protestant cause and Religion (much endangered in all places) may be promoted and secured, the Plots of Popish Enemies to extirpate them prevented; the Peace, Government, Laws and Liberties of our Kingdoms, restored, preserved, and perpetuated to posterity; and just publick Debts of the Nation and Souldiers arrears discharged; a general Act of Indempnity, Pardon and Oblivion of all sorts of persons justly capable thereof, procured; all former Inquiries, Feuds, Animosities totally extinguished, and all just sales of duly confiscated Estates, made without Fraud, Covin, Practice or Duresse for valuable considerations, confirmed or recompenced; that so all parties and interests being perfectly reconciled, may henceforth studiously endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of Peace, and to live peaceable and quiet Lives under their lawfull Kings and Governors in all Godlinesse and Honesty being all Members of one and the same Mystical and politick Body, having all one Spiritual and Temporal Lord, one Faith, one Baptism, and one God, and Father; which should both perswade and oblige them to put away all bitterness, wrath, anger, clamour, evil speaking, with all malice, and to be kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven them, forbearing one another in love. But if we still proceed to bite and devour one another (as we have done for many years by-past) we shall sodenly be consumed one of another, and made a prey to our common Enemies; which the accomplishment of these instructions by Gods blessing, and the Parliaments wisdom, will prevent, and make us once more THE GLORY AND LADY OF ALL CHRISTIAN KINGDOMS as we are now their reproach.

APPENDIX III

Instructions for Members of the Parliament summoned for 21st March, 1681, believed to have been prepared by the Earl of Shaftesbury.

Gentlemen,

We have chosen you two, our knights, to represent this county at the Parliament to be holden at Oxford the twenty-first of March next; and we do give you sufficient power to act on our behalf in all things that shall be found, by joint advice with the Members of Parliament chosen for other places, to be for our public good and welfare; which we must leave to your integrities and prudence. Only there are some particulars so manifestly and indisputably necessary, that we cannot omit to give you our instructions and directions beforehand in them.

First. We all expect that you should, to the last, insist for a bill to exclude the Duke of York by name, and all other Popish successors, from coming to the imperial crown of this realm.

Secondly. That you insist upon an adjustment to be made betwixt the King's prerogative of calling, proroguing, and dissolving Parliaments, and the rights of the people to have annual Parliaments to despatch and provide for those important affairs and business that can nowhere else be taken care of; for, without the certainty of Parliaments meeting in due distance of time from each other, and their sitting so long as shall be necessary for the despatch of the affairs of the nation, it is not possible but that our laws, liberties, lives and estates should become in a short time at the will of the prince.

Thirdly. We expect you should restore to us that liberty we and our forefathers have enjoyed, until these last forty years, of being free from guards and mercenary soldiers; it being the inseparable right of a free nation that they themselves, and no separate number of paid or hired men, should have the guard of their own prince, government, and laws.

Lastly. Although we mention these three particulars as most necessary to us, yet there are several others of great importance which we leave to your wisdoms; assuring ourselves that until you have fully provided for a complete security against Popery and arbitrary power, you will not give any of our money.

APPENDIX IV

Chronological Summary of Parliaments and Ministries

[Dates of Ministries are not given prior to 1770. T = Tory; W = Whig;
C = Conservative; L = Liberal; Lab. = Labour.]

| | | | |
|------------|-----------------------|------------|--|
| Apr. 1660 | Parliament met. | Nov. 1747 | Parliament met. |
| Dec. 1660 | Parliament dissolved. | Apr. 1754 | Parliament dissolved. |
| May 1661 | Parliament met. | Nov. 1754 | Parliament met. |
| Jan. 1679 | Parliament dissolved. | Mar. 1761 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Mar. 1679 | Parliament met. | May 1761 | Parliament met. |
| July 1679 | Parliament dissolved. | Mar. 1768 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Oct. 1679 | Parliament met. | May 1768 | Parliament met. |
| Jan. 1681 | Parliament dissolved. | Jan. 1770 | North (T) took office. |
| Mar. 1681 | Parliament met. | Sept. 1774 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Mar. 1681 | Parliament dissolved. | Nov. 1774 | Parliament met. |
| May 1685 | Parliament met. | Sept. 1780 | Parliament dissolved. |
| July 1687 | Parliament dissolved. | Oct. 1780 | Parliament met. |
| Jan. 1689 | Parliament met. | Mar. 1782 | North (T) resigned. |
| Feb. 1690 | Parliament dissolved. | Mar. 1782 | Rockingham (W) took office. |
| Mar. 1690 | Parliament met. | July 1782 | Rockingham (W) died. |
| Oct. 1695 | Parliament dissolved. | July 1782 | Shelburne (Coalition) took office. |
| Nov. 1695 | Parliament met. | Feb. 1783 | Shelburne (Coalition) resigned, owing to lack of support. |
| July 1698 | Parliament dissolved. | Apr. 1783 | Portland, Fox, North (Coalition) took office. |
| Aug. 1698 | Parliament met. | Dec. 1783 | Portland, Fox, North (Coalition) dismissed. |
| Dec. 1700 | Parliament dissolved. | Dec. 1783 | Pitt (T) took office. |
| Feb. 1701 | Parliament met. | Mar. 1784 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Nov. 1701 | Parliament dissolved. | May 1784 | Parliament met. |
| Dec. 1701 | Parliament met. | June 1790 | Parliament dissolved. |
| July 1702 | Parliament dissolved. | Nov. 1790 | Parliament met. |
| Aug. 1702 | Parliament met. | May 1796 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Apr. 1705 | Parliament dissolved. | Sept. 1796 | Parliament met. |
| Oct. 1705 | Parliament met. | Mar. 1801 | Pitt (T) resigned, disagreeing with George III on Roman Catholic question. |
| Apr. 1708 | Parliament dissolved. | Mar. 1801 | Addington (T) took office. |
| Nov. 1708 | Parliament met. | June 1802 | Parliament dissolved. |
| Sept. 1710 | Parliament dissolved. | Nov. 1802 | Parliament met. |
| Nov. 1710 | Parliament met. | May 1804 | Addington (T) resigned, owing to lack of support. |
| Aug. 1713 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Nov. 1713 | Parliament met. | | |
| Jan. 1715 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Mar. 1715 | Parliament met. | | |
| Mar. 1722 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Oct. 1722 | Parliament met. | | |
| Aug. 1727 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Jan. 1728 | Parliament met. | | |
| Apr. 1734 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Jan. 1735 | Parliament met. | | |
| Apr. 1741 | Parliament dissolved. | | |
| Dec. 1741 | Parliament met. | | |
| June 1747 | Parliament dissolved. | | |

- May 1804 Pitt (T) took office.
 Jan. 1806 Pitt (T) died.
 Jan. 1806 Grenville (Coalition) took office.
 Oct. 1806 Parliament dissolved.
 Dec. 1806 Parliament met.
 Mar. 1807 Grenville (Coalition) dismissed, for refusing to give pledge on Roman Catholic question.
 Mar. 1807 Portland (T) took office.
 Apr. 1807 Parliament dissolved.
 June 1807 Parliament met.
 Sept. 1809 Portland (T) resigned, owing to ill health.
 Oct. 1809 Perceval (T) took office.
 May 1812 Perceval (T) died.
 June 1812 Liverpool (T) took office.
 Sept. 1812 Parliament dissolved.
 Nov. 1812 Parliament met.
 June 1818 Parliament dissolved.
 Jan. 1819 Parliament met.
 Feb. 1820 Parliament dissolved (demise of Crown).
 Apr. 1820 Parliament met.
 June 1826 Parliament dissolved.
 Nov. 1826 Parliament met.
 Mar. 1827 Liverpool (T) resigned, owing to ill health.
 Apr. 1827 Canning (Coalition) took office.
 Aug. 1827 Canning (Coalition) died.
 Aug. 1827 Goderich (Coalition) took office.
 Jan. 1828 Goderich (Coalition) resigned, owing to internal dissensions.
 Jan. 1828 Wellington (T) took office.
 July 1830 Parliament dissolved (demise of Crown).
 Oct. 1830 Parliament met.
 Nov. 1830 Wellington (T) defeated in House of Commons on Civil List, and resigned.
 Nov. 1830 Grey (L) took office.
 Apr. 1831 Grey (L) defeated in House of Commons on Reform Bill (Committee stage).
 Apr. 1831 Parliament dissolved.
 June 1831 Parliament met.
 May 1832 Grey (L) resigned, and resumed office in the same month.
 Dec. 1832 Parliament dissolved, to enable the new franchise and distribution to operate.
 Jan. 1833 Parliament met.
 July 1834 Grey (L) resigned, owing to internal dissensions.
 July 1834 Melbourne (L) took office.
 Nov. 1834 Melbourne (L) resigned, at the King's suggestion.
 Dec. 1834 Peel (C) took office (after Wellington had acted for a short time on his behalf).
 Dec. 1834 Parliament dissolved.
 Feb. 1835 Parliament met.
 Apr. 1835 Peel (C) defeated in House of Commons on motion by Opposition relative to Irish Church revenues and resigned.
 Apr. 1835 Melbourne (L) took office.
 July 1837 Parliament dissolved (demise of Crown).
 Nov. 1837 Parliament met.
 May 1839 Melbourne (L) resigned, and resumed office in the same month (Bedchamber question).
 June 1841 Melbourne (L) defeated in House of Commons (non-confidence vote).
 June 1841 Parliament dissolved.
 Aug. 1841 Parliament met.
 Aug. 1841 Melbourne (L) defeated in House of - Commons and resigned.

- Sept. 1841 Peel (C) took office.
- Dec. 1845 Peel (C) resigned, and resumed office in the same month (Free Trade question).
- June 1846 Peel (C) defeated in House of Commons on Irish Coercion Bill and resigned.
- July 1846 Russell (L) took office.
- July 1847 Parliament dissolved.
- Nov. 1847 Parliament met.
- Feb. 1851 Russell (L) resigned, and resumed office in the same month.
- Feb. 1852 Russell (L) defeated in House of Commons on Militia Bill and resigned.
- Feb. 1852 Derby (C) took office.
- July 1852 Parliament dissolved.
- Nov. 1852 Parliament met.
- Dec. 1852 Derby (C) defeated in House of Commons on Budget and resigned.
- Dec. 1852 Aberdeen (Coalition) took office.
- Jan. 1855 Aberdeen (Coalition) defeated in House of Commons on Sebastopol Committee and resigned.
- Feb. 1855 Palmerston (L) took office.
- Mar. 1857 Palmerston (L) defeated in House of Commons on Chinese question.
- Mar. 1857 Parliament dissolved.
- Apr. 1857 Parliament met.
- Feb. 1858 Palmerston (L) defeated in House of Commons on Conspiracy to Murder Bill and resigned.
- Feb. 1858 Derby (C) took office.
- Mar. 1859 Derby (C) defeated in House of Commons on Reform Bill.
- Apr. 1859 Parliament dissolved.
- May 1859 Parliament met.
- June 1859 Derby (C) defeated in House of Commons on amendment to Address and resigned.
- June 1859 Palmerston (L) took office.
- July 1865 Parliament dissolved.
- Oct. 1865 Palmerston (L) died.
- Oct. 1865 Russell (L) took office.
- Feb. 1866 Parliament met.
- June 1866 Russell (L) defeated in House of Commons on Reform Bill and resigned.
- June 1866 Derby (C) took office.
- Feb. 1868 Derby (C) resigned, owing to ill health.
- Feb. 1868 Disraeli (C) took office.
- Apr. 1868 Disraeli (C) defeated in House of Commons on Disestablishment of Irish Church.
- Nov. 1868 Parliament dissolved.
- Dec. 1868 Disraeli (C) resigned, owing to losses of his party in general election.
- Dec. 1868 Gladstone (L) took office.
- Dec. 1868 Parliament met.
- Mar. 1873 Gladstone (L) defeated in House of Commons on Irish University Bill and resigned, but resumed office in the same month.
- Jan. 1874 Parliament dissolved.
- Feb. 1874 Gladstone (L) resigned, owing to losses of his party in general election.
- Feb. 1874 Disraeli (C) took office.
- Mar. 1874 Parliament met.
- Mar. 1880 Parliament dissolved.
- Apr. 1880 Disraeli (C) resigned, owing to losses of his party in general election.

| | |
|---|--|
| Apr. 1880 Gladstone (L) took office. | July 1902 Salisbury (C) resigned, owing to old age. |
| Apr. 1880 Parliament met. | July 1902 Balfour (C) took office. |
| June 1885 Gladstone (L) defeated in House of Commons on Budget and resigned. | Dec. 1905 Balfour (C) resigned. |
| June 1885 Salisbury (C) took office. | Dec. 1905 Campbell-Bannerman (L) took office. |
| Nov. 1885 Parliament dissolved. | Jan. 1906 Parliament dissolved. |
| Jan. 1886 Parliament met. | Feb. 1906 Parliament met. |
| Jan. 1886 Salisbury (C) defeated in House of Commons on Address and resigned. | Apr. 1908 Campbell-Bannerman (L) resigned, owing to ill health. |
| Feb. 1886 Gladstone (L) took office. | Apr. 1908 Asquith (L) took office. |
| June 1886 Gladstone (L) defeated in House of Commons on Home Rule for Ireland. | Jan. 1910 Parliament dissolved (Relations between the two Houses). |
| June 1886 Parliament dissolved. | Feb. 1910 Parliament met. |
| July 1886 Gladstone (L) resigned, owing to losses of his party in general election. | Nov. 1910 Parliament dissolved (Relations between the two Houses). |
| July 1886 Salisbury (C) took office. | Jan. 1911 Parliament met. |
| Aug. 1886 Parliament met. | May 1915 Ministry reconstructed on Coalition basis. |
| June 1892 Parliament dissolved. | Dec. 1916 Asquith (L) resigned, owing to lack of support. |
| Aug. 1892 Parliament met. | Dec. 1916 Lloyd George (Coalition) took office. |
| Aug. 1892 Salisbury (C) defeated in House of Commons, on vote of non-confidence. | Nov. 1918 Parliament dissolved. |
| Aug. 1892 Gladstone (L) took office. | Feb. 1919 Parliament met. |
| Mar. 1894 Gladstone (L) resigned, owing to old age. | Oct. 1922 Lloyd George (Coalition) resigned, owing to internal dissensions. |
| Mar. 1894 Rosebery (L) took office. | Oct. 1922 Bonar Law (C) took office. |
| June 1895 Rosebery (L) defeated in House of Commons on Cordite question and resigned. | Oct. 1922 Parliament dissolved. |
| June 1895 Salisbury (C) took office. | Nov. 1922 Parliament met. |
| July 1895 Parliament dissolved. | May 1923 Bonar Law (C) resigned, owing to ill health. |
| Aug. 1895 Parliament met. | May 1923 Baldwin (C) took office. |
| Sept. 1900 Parliament dissolved. | Nov. 1923 Parliament dissolved. |
| Dec. 1900 Parliament met. | Jan. 1924 Parliament met. |
| | Jan. 1924 Baldwin (C) defeated in House of Commons on vote of non-confidence and resigned. |
| | Jan. 1924 MacDonald (Lab.) took office. |
| | Oct. 1924 MacDonald (Lab.) defeated in House of |

| | Commons, on ques- tion of Campbell Case. | | party in general elec- tion. |
|-----------|---|-----------|---|
| Oct. 1924 | Parliament dissolved. | June 1929 | MacDonald (Lab.) took office. |
| Nov. 1924 | MacDonald (Lab.) re- signed, owing to losses of his party in general election. | June 1929 | Parliament met. |
| | | Aug. 1931 | MacDonald (Lab.) re- signed, owing to in- ternal dissensions. |
| Nov. 1924 | Baldwin (C) took office. | Aug. 1931 | MacDonald (Coali- tion) took office. |
| Dec. 1924 | Parliament met. | Oct. 1931 | Parliament dissolved. |
| May 1929 | Parliament dissolved. | Nov. 1931 | Parliament met. |
| June 1929 | Baldwin (C) resigned, owing to losses of his | | |

APPENDIX V

Notes on the Chart of Parliaments and Ministries

1. The chart is intended to depict in compendious form the incidents in the histories of Parliaments and Ministries since 1780, of which a summary is given in Appendix IV. It is also intended to give a visual impression of some of the developments in constitutional usage, which have been mentioned in the body of the book, especially Chapter VII, § 3, and Chapter XI, § 1.

2. The date of each year on the chart marks the beginning of that year. Each space between the vertical lines represents six months; a year, that is to say, occupies two vertical spaces.

3. The upper (straight) line represents the course of Parliaments. The lower (variform) line represents the course of Ministries. A break in the upper line (having vertical strokes to mark the end of one Parliament and the beginning of another) represents a dissolution of Parliament. A break in the lower line (having vertical strokes to mark the end of one Ministry and the beginning of another) represents the substitution of a new Ministry for an old one. An isolated vertical stroke in the lower line denotes the death or resignation of a Prime Minister, followed by the formation of a new Ministry consisting of members of the same party.

4. When two vertical strokes in the lower line come closely before two vertical strokes in the upper line, there is signified a change of Ministry without any appeal to the people by the retiring Ministry, the appeal being made by the new Ministry soon after attaining office.

When two vertical strokes in the lower line come closely after two vertical strokes in the upper line, there is signified a resignation due to a Ministry having appealed to the people, but having found itself in a minority in the new House of Commons.

When two vertical strokes in the lower line come between two vertical strokes in the upper line, there is signified a resignation during a period of a dissolution; the resignation following as an immediate result of the voting at a general election.

When two vertical strokes in the upper line have no adjacent strokes in the lower line, there is signified a continuance in office of a Ministry through and after a period of dissolution of Parliament.

5. It will be seen that, in the period from 1780 to 1867, changes of Ministry frequently occurred irrespective of, or before, elections as well as after or as a result of them. At that period, changes of Ministry never happened during the dissolution of Parliament, as an immediate result of the voting of the people at elections. But after 1867, except in periods of party disorganization (e.g. 1885-6 and 1923-4), or in instances of irresolution displayed by those in power (e.g. 1895 and 1905), it has become the practice for changes of Ministry to occur during dissolutions of Parliament, as an immediate result of a turnover of votes at an election.

Two examples since 1867 (namely 1892 and 1924) may be noticed in which resignations were delayed by Ministries until a new House of Commons had shown in whose favour there was a majority. On these occasions a clear preference for one party or the other could not be inferred from the voting at the elections.

The only dissolution, precipitated by a defeat in the House of Commons (marked DA on the chart), which was not followed by a change of Ministry was that of 1831; and that instance was a peculiar one.

Nearly every appeal to the people for support by a newly appointed Ministry (marked NA on the chart), has been followed by a long period of office.

INDEX

- Aberdeen, 4th Earl of, 124.
 Acts of Parliament, see Statutes.
 Addresses, Election: formal character of, in eighteenth century, 116, 182-3, 197.
 of party leaders, for stating issues, 284-7.
 Anne, Queen:
 public opinion at the time of, 37-8.
 parties under, 101-3.
 choice of Ministers by, 141-2.
 election management under, 169, 170.
 royal influence over elections, 175, 282.
 Anson, Sir William R., 230-1, 234.
 Anti-Corn Law League, 79, 91, 259, 264.
 Anti-Slavery movement, 79, 91, 259.
 Argyll, 8th Duke of, 287.
 Ashley, Lord (after 1851 7th Earl of Shaftesbury): resignation of seat, 30.
 and social legislation, 61-2.
 and public meetings, 83.
 Asquith, H. H. (after 1925 1st Earl of Oxford and Asquith):
 on mandate principle, 12.
 on public opinion, 71.
 and tariff reform, 226-7.
 and mandate for Parliament Bill, 233, 293.
 on Ministry's right to dissolution, 280.
 on referendum, 296, 299.
 on degree of authority of mandate, 303.
 Associations, political, see Political associations.
 Bagehot, Walter, 13, 69.
 Baldwin, Stanley: appointment to premiership, 148.
 and 1923 election, 164.
 and 1929 election, 252.
 on bribery of electorate, 252.
 and formulation of issues, 290.
 Balfour, A. J. (after 1922 1st Earl of):
 and dependence of Ministry on House of Commons, 158-9.
 and tariff reform, 225-7, 257.
 and mandate for Parliament Bill, 229, 299.
 and adverse by-elections, 278.
 on referendum, 295-6.
 on extent of mandate, 300.
 other references to, 255, 279.
 Beaconsfield, 1st Earl of, see Disraeli, Benjamin.
 Beckford, William, 23.
 Bills, publication of, 66-8.
 Bolingbroke, 1st Viscount (till 1712 Henry Saint-John), 36, 103, 109.
 Bonjour, Felix, 298.
 Bribery, at elections, 204-5, 252.
 Bright, John, 92, 115, 243, 260.
 Broadcasting:
 and public opinion, 64.
 and election issues, 291.
 Brougham, Henry F. (after 1830 1st Baron):
 on representation, 3.
 on direct and representative government, 6.
 on national representation, 26.
 on party government, 111.
 on the Sovereign's choice of Ministers, 147.
 on 'the people', 313-14.
 Broughton, 1st Baron, see Hobhouse, J. C.
 Bryce, James (after 1914 1st Viscount):
 on the mandate principle, 10.
 on party principles, 111.
 his report on Reform of Second Chamber, 234, 297, 299.
 on men and measures, 244.
 on political capacity of the people, 310.
 on 'the people', 315.
 Buckle, G. E., 125.
 Bulwer, Edward Lytton (after 1866 Baron Lytton), 207.
 Burdett, Sir Francis, 19.
 Burke, Edmund:
 on petitioning, 24.
 on national representation, 24-5.
 views concerning public opinion, 54-6.
 on public meetings, 81.
 on party government, 110, 111.
 on division lists, 119 (note).
 and party organization, 130, 132.
 on lack of people's interest in politics, 184.
 on virtual representation, 191.
 on men and measures, 290.

- Burke, Edmund: continued.
on political capacity of the people, 309.
on 'the people', 313.
other references to, 19, 48.
- Bute, 3rd Earl of, 161.
- By-elections, adverse, as reason for general election, 276-9.
- Cabinet, see Ministry.
- Cairns, 1st Earl, 216.
- Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Henry:
and tariff reform, 227.
and House of Lords question, 229-30.
on extent of mandate, 300.
- Canning, George:
on duties of members, 29.
his publication of State papers, 66.
on public opinion, 70.
on estimates of party strength, 114.
on King's choice of Ministers, 144-6.
on 'the people', 312, 313.
other references to, 90, 108, 287.
- Carteret, John, see Granville, Earl.
- Cartwright, John, 56.
- Cases, decided in the Courts:
Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne, 28.
Burden v. Rugler, 83.
Luby v. Warwickshire Miners' Association, 90.
R v. Aldred, 86.
R v. Birt and others, 86.
R v. Burns and others, 85.
R v. Collins, 85.
R v. Cunninghame Graham and Burns, 83.
R v. Fussell, 85.
R v. Tutchin, 84.
R v. Vincent and others, 85.
Wason v. Walter, 66.
- Catholic Association, 90-1.
- Cave, Sir George (after 1918 1st Viscount), 4.
- Cecil, Robert (after 1605 1st Earl of Salisbury), 34.
- Cecil, Lord Robert, see Salisbury, 3rd Marquis of.
- Chadwick, Edwin, 62.
- Chamberlain, Sir Austen, 227.
- Chamberlain, Joseph:
leaves Gladstone Ministry, 31-2. and National Liberal Federation, 134.
and tariff reform, 225-8.
and Home Rule for Ireland, 256-7.
his influence on submission of issues, 260-1.
- Chamberlayne, Edward, 26.
- Charles I:
and public opinion, 35.
- Charles II:
and public opinion, 35-6.
parties under, 99, 100.
election management under, 168.
- Chartist movement, 84-5, 92-3.
- Chatham, 1st Earl of (till 1766 William Pitt):
and 'Jews' Act', 45.
claimed as a leader by public opinion, 49-52.
on public opinion and reform in representation, 53-4.
and party government, 106-7, 110, 111.
and collective responsibility of Ministers, 150-1.
motions of, for dissolution of Parliament, 186.
other references to, 47, 123, 239.
- Chesterfield, 4th Earl of, 45, 104, 160, 177.
- Churchill, Lord Randolph, 243, 260-1.
- Churchill, Winston, 31.
- Cider, tax on (1763), agitation against, 76, 81.
- Clarke, Sir Edward, 31.
- Clubs, political, 130.
- Coalitions.
and party system, 123-7.
and choice of Ministers, 149.
- Cobbett, William.
and parliamentary debates, 65-6.
and Reform Bill, 1832, 203.
and Tamworth Manifesto, 206.
- Cobden, Richard, 92, 260.
- Coffee-houses, and public opinion, 36.
- Coke, Sir Edward, 25.
- Cole, G. D. H., 33.
- Commons, see House of Commons.
- Conservative party, organization of, 133, 136-7.
- Constituents, relations with Members, 5, 6, 14-33.
- Corn Laws, repeal of, 108, 122, 211-14, 275.
- Corrupt practices, at elections, 204-5, 252.
- Counties, elections for, as indicating sense of the people, 187-91.
- County associations, 88-9.
- County meetings, 81-2.
- Courtney of Penwith, 1st Baron, 231, 292.
- Cowper, 1st Earl, 176.
- Coxe, William, 43, 48.
- Creevey, Thomas, 171.

- Cries, party, 177.
 Croker, J. W., 30, 206-7.
 Cromwell, Oliver, 35.
 Crown, see Sovereign.
 Curzon, 1st Marquis: and premiership, 148.
 and House of Lords question, 231, 233.
 on referendum, 295, 299.
 Davenant, Charles, 174 (note).
 Debates in Parliament, publication of, 39, 40, 65-6.
 Defoe, Daniel, 37, 174, 313.
 Delegates, Members as, 6, 20 ff.
 Deputations to Ministers, 79-80.
 Derby, 14th Earl of (till 1851 Lord Stanley), 91, 158, 242.
 Devonshire, 8th Duke of (till 1891 Marquis of Hartington), 11, 222-3, 292.
 Dicey, A. V.: on the mandate principle, 10.
 on public opinion, 60 (note), 63.
 on dependence of Ministries on the House of Commons, 159.
 on sovereignty of Legislature, 276.
 Direct government, and representative government, 5-6.
 Disraeli, Benjamin (after 1876 1st Earl of Beaconsfield): and representation, 3.
 on political education, 64.
 on petitioning, 77.
 on public meetings, 83.
 and coalitions, 124-5.
 and party organization, 133-4.
 his retention of office in a minority, 158.
 and people's part in choice of Ministries, 163-4.
 and Peel's repeal of the Corn Laws, 211-12.
 and the Reform Act, 1867, 214-16.
 and Ministerial crisis of 1873, 218, 253.
 and issues affected by party tactics, 246-9.
 on 'the people', 312.
 other references to, 67, 241-2, 259,
 268, 286, 287, 289.
 Dissolution of Parliament: function of, 162-6, 209, 212, 213, 216, 217.
 Prime Minister's right to, 280.
 Division lists, as electioneering literature, 115-19.
 Education Acts, influence of public opinion on, 63.
 Egmont, 1st Earl of, 44, 129.
 Egmont, 2nd Earl of, 23 (note), 186.
 Eldon, 1st Earl of, 20.
 Election addresses, see Addresses,
 election.
 Election cries, 177.
 Election issues, see Issues.
 Elections, General, see General elections.
 Electorate, see People.
 Elizabeth, Queen, 34.
 Excise Scheme of 1733, 21, 38, 41-4, 75, 80, 239. •
 Faction, in relation to party government, 105, 108-13.
 Factory legislation, public opinion and, 60-1.
 Federations of local political associations, 133-9.
 Fox, Charles James:
 on national representation, 26.
 on public opinion, 56-9.
 on public meetings, 81.
 on dependence of Ministries on House of Commons, 152-3, 159.
 on connexion between general elections and views of the people, 194-5.
 other references to, 65, 88-9, 123-4, 151, 184, 197.
 Fox, Henry (after 1763 1st Baron Holland), 313.
 France, comparison with working of Constitution in, 29, 69, 280-1, 306, 308 (note).
 Free trade and protection, 30, 211-14, 264.
 Gathorne-Hardy, G. (after 1878 Viscount, and later Earl of Cranbrook), 250, 254.
 General elections:
 uncertainty of results of, in eighteenth century, 119-22.
 methods of interpreting results of, in eighteenth century, 187-91.
 time for, 265-81.
 individual elections:
 1660: 14, 116.
 1679: 131, 168.
 1681: 15, 16, 100, 117, 131, 177.
 1685: 169.
 1690: 100 (note), 117.
 1695: 102, 141, 172.
 1698: 177.
 1701 (1st): 141, 172.
 1701 (2nd): 17, 172, 237, 265, 283.
 1702: 117, 141, 175, 228.

General Elections: continued.

- 1705: 18, 118, 169.
 1710: 118, 141, 169, 170, 175.
 1713: 102, 238, 266.
 1715: 18, 176, 238.
 1722: 118, 131, 176, 177, 239.
 1734: 118, 120, 131, 188, 239.
 1741: 104, 120, 131, 160, 189, 239.
 1747: 131, 266.
 1761: 18, 121.
 1768: 19, 283.
 1774: 19, 193, 266.
 1780: 19.
 1784: 107, 182, 193, 196-8, 201, 210, 240, 284.
 1806: 193, 267-8.
 1807: 133, 267-8.
 1812: 266.
 1826: 190, 199, 259.
 1830: 200, 224.
 1831: 121, 201-2, 210, 240, 284, 291, 296.
 1832: 259, 260.
 1834: 121, 133, 147, 206-8, 286.
 1837: 122, 245-6, 257.
 1841: 162, 208-11, 245-6.
 1847: 214, 239, 286.
 1852: 133, 262, 285.
 1857: 122, 287.
 1859: 242.
 1865: 134, 260, 263, 285.
 1868: 134, 163-4, 217, 247, 250, 255, 285-6, 296, 301-2.
 1874: 164-5, 246, 250, 277-8, 285.
 1880: 247-8, 255, 257, 263, 285, 287, 288, 300.
 1885: 164, 221-2, 256.
 1886: 11, 166, 224-5, 254, 286, 288, 291-2.
 1892: 164, 249, 256, 289, 290, 298.
 1895: 136, 262.
 1900: 225, 268, 296, 300.
 1906: 137, 228, 257, 259, 264, 296.
 1910 (1st): 232, 293, 296.
 1910 (2nd): 232-4, 293.
 1918: 251, 290.
 1922: 251, 258, 271.
 1923: 164, 251, 286.
 1929: 252, 255, 290, 307.
 1931: 271, 290.
- George I:
 parties under, 104.
 royal influence over elections, 176-7.
- George II:
 parties under, 104-6.
 choice of Ministers by, 142.
 election management under, 105-6, 170.

- George III:
 and public opinion, 98.
 parties under, 106-7, 110.
 choice of Ministers by, 142-5.
 election management under, 170-1.
 and election of 1784, 107, 196-8.
- George IV:
 choice of Ministers by, 143, 145-6.
 election management under, 171.
- Gladstone, W. E.:
 and representation, 3.
 removes paper duty, 64.
 on political education, 64.
 on dependence of Ministry on House of Commons, 158, 164-6.
 and disestablishment of Irish Church, 216, 217.
 and Ministerial crisis of 1873, 218.
 and Ministerial crisis of 1885, 218.
 and Home Rule for Ireland, 11, 221-5, 255-7.
 confidence in, issue of, in 1886, 243.
 and effect of party tactics on issues, 246-9.
 and adverse by-elections, 277-8.
 and the formulation of issues, 287-9, 292.
 on political capacity of the people, 310.
 other references to, 79, 135, 149, 215, 220, 241, 250, 254-5, 260, 304.
- Godolphin, 1st Earl of, 119, 142.
- Gordon, Lord George, 89.
- Forst, Sir John, 134, 136.
- Goulburn, H., 90.
- Grafton, 3rd Duke of, 130.
- Granville, Earl (till 1744 John Carteret), 106.
- Great War of 1914-18, 125, 244, 251, 304.
- Grenville, Baron, 193, 268.
- Greville, C. C. F., 108, 206.
- Grey, 2nd Earl (in 1806 and 1807 Viscount Howick):
 on King's choice of Ministers, 144.
 appointment as Prime Minister, 146.
 and Reform Bill, 1832, 200-3.
- Grey, 3rd Earl, 217.
- Guizot, F. P. G., 2.
- Haldane, R. B. (after 1911 1st Viscount), 233, 293-4.
- Harcourt, Sir William, 149, 262.
- Hardwicke, 4th Earl of, 109, 130.
- Hardy, G. Gathorne-, see Gathorne-Hardy, G.
- Hardy, Thomas, 80.

- Harley, Robert (after 1711 Earl of Oxford):
 and public opinion, 37.
 and election management, 170.
 other references to, 103, 119.
- Harrowby, 1st Earl of, 203.
- Hartington, Marquis of, see Devonshire, 8th Duke of.
- Hawkesbury, Baron, see Liverpool, 2nd Earl of.
- Hervey, Baron, 44.
- Hobhouse, J. C. (after 1851 1st Baron Broughton), 19, 30, 163, 209, 274.
- Holland, 1st Baron, see Fox, Henry.
- Holland, 3rd Baron, 132.
- Home Rule for Ireland, see Ireland.
- House of Commons:
 Ministries dependent on, 149-59.
 conflict with House of Lords, 228-34.
- House of Lords, as guardians of the people: in 1872 and 1884, 219, 220.
 in 1909-11, 228-34.
- Howick, Viscount, see Grey, 2nd Earl.
- Hume, Joseph, 19.
- Inge, Dean, on bribery of electorate, 253.
- Instructions to Members:
 at elections, 14-20, 316-18, 319.
 between elections, 6, 20-4.
 legality of, 27-8.
- Intimidation at elections, 205.
- Ireland, Home Rule for, 11, 32, 221-5, 248-9, 255-7.
- Irish Church, disestablishment of, 216-17, 255.
- Issues:
 regarding past, 237-9.
 regarding future, 250-3.
 regarding men or measures, 239-45.
 affected by party tactics, 245-50.
 rules for submission of, 253-8. influences affecting submission of, 258-64.
 formulation of, 281-94.
- James II:
 and public opinion, 36-7.
 parties under, 99, 100.
 election management under, 169.
- Jebb, John, 24.
- Jenkins, Sir Leoline, 39.
- Jenkins' Ear, War of, 46-9.
- Jews, agitation against in 1753, 45-6.
- Johnson, Dr. Samuel, 49, 65, 78, 184.
- King, the, see Sovereign.
- Kins' 'friends', 109, 106.
- Labour party, organization of, 94-5, 137-8.
- Lansdowne, 5th Marquis of, 230-2, 304.
- Law, A. Bonar, 251, 258, 290.
- Legislation:
 details of, how far people to decide, 291-4.
 how far people can judge of, 308-11.
- Liberal party, organization of, 134-6.
- Liverpool, 2nd Earl of (from 1803 to 1808 Baron Hawkesbury), 171, 267-8, 270.
- Lloyd George, David: and Representation of the People Act, 1918, 4.
 and tariff reform, 226.
 his Budget of 1909, 230-2.
 and election of 1922, 251.
 and election of 1929, 255.
 his manifesto of 1918, 290.
- Lords, House of, see House of Lords.
- Loreburn, 1st Earl of, 233.
- Lyndhurst, 1st Baron, 20.
- Macaulay, T. B. (after 1857 1st Baron):
 and duties of Members, 32.
 and dependence of Ministries on House of Commons, 156-7.
 on virtual representation, 192.
 on general elections in times of excitement, 274-5.
- MacDonald, J. Ramsay: and constituents, 32.
 and National Government, 126.
 on referendum, 297.
 on extent of mandate, 300-1.
 on mandate principle, 304, 310.
- Macpherson, James, 38.
- Maine, Sir Henry, 10.
- Mandate, principle of:
 generally, 9-13.
 delayed by royal influence, 168-78.
 early signs of, 178-82.
 apparent instances of application of, 192-8.
 history of development of, 199-236.
 extent of, 299-302.
 degree of authority, variations in, 302-3.
- Mansfield, 1st Earl of, 191.
- Marvell, Andrew, 20-1.
- Meetings, public, see Public meetings.
- Meetings, party, of Members of Parliament, 128-31.
- Melbourne, 2nd Viscount:
 so-called dismissal of, in 1834, 147.

- Melbourne, 2nd Viscount: continued.
 views on function of dissolution, 162-3.
 and Reform Bill, 1832, 202.
 and dissolution in 1841, 208-11, 274, 282.
- Members of Parliament: instructions to, 6, 14-24, 316-18, 319.
 pledges by, 5, 19-20.
 represent the nation, 24-7.
 obligations of, to constituents, 27-33.
 organization of, 128-31.
 influence of, on submission of issues, 260-2.
- Men and Measures, issues regarding, 239-45.
- Midlothian Campaigns, Gladstone's, 248-9, 288.
- Mill, James, 24.
- Mill, John Stuart, 3 (note), 24, 308.
- Mines, regulation of, influence of public opinion on, 61.
- Ministry:
 choice of, dependent on Crown, 141-9.
 choice of, dependent on House of Commons, 149-59.
 choice of, dependent on the people, 159-67. change of, necessitating general election, 163, 166, 216, 218, 269-71.
 Sovereign's insistence on nonparty, 102-3.
 coalition, 123-7.
 increased importance of, 9, 142.
 position of, regarding definition of issues and time for elections, 253-8, 265-9.
- Montesquieu, Charles Comte de, 308.
- Morley, John (after 1908 1st Viscount):
 on House of Lords question, 231.
 and mandate for Parliament Bill, 233.
 on submission of details of legislation to the people, 292-3.
 on extent of mandate, 301-2.
 other references to, 55, 108, 262.
- Mosley, Sir Oswald, 32.
- National representation, 6 (and note), 24-7.
- Newcastle [-on-Tyne], 1st Duke of (second creation), 169.
- Newcastle [-under-Lyme], 1st Duke of:
 and 'Jews' Act', 45-6.
 and War of Jenkins' Ear, 48.
 relations of with elder Pitt, 49-52.
 his timidity, 50, 51, 53.
 and party organization, 190, 192.
 other references to, 109, 161, 287.
 'Newcastle programme', 135-6, 249, 262.
- Newspapers and public opinion, see Press.
- North, Lord, 38, 113, 151, 155, 161, 186, 193, 195.
- O'Connell, Daniel, 90.
- Onslow, Arthur, 104 (note).
- Onslow, George, 130.
- Opposition:
 early notions of, 104-13.
 and coalitions, 123, 125-6.
 position of, in respect of definition of issues, 218, 253-8.
- Owen, Robert, 60.
- Oxford, Earl of, see Harley, Robert.
- Oxford and Asquith, 1st Earl of, see Asquith, H. H.
- Paine, Thomas, 2.
- Palmerston, 3rd Viscount:
 and representation, 3.
 confidence in, issue of, 241-3.
 other references to, 122, 149.
- Pamphlets, political, see Tracts, political.
- Paper duty, removal of, 64.
- Parliament, see Dissolution, General Elections, House of Commons, House of Lords, Members of Parliament.
- Parliamentary debates, see Debates.
- Parliamentary papers and reports, publication of, 66-7.
- Parties:
 and the people, generally, 7, 8.
 sketch of history of, 98-108.
 and faction, 108-13.
 discipline, early lack of, 113-15.
 composition of, ignorance of constituents regarding, 115-19.
 and coalitions, 123-7.
 organization of, 128-40.
 compared with groups, 127, 143, 149, 167, 241, 244.
 and see Three-party system.
- Peel, Sir Robert:
 resigns his seat, 30.
 and Public Health legislation, 62.
 on public opinion, 71.
 on party discipline, 115.
 on King's choice of Ministers, in 1844, 147-8.

- Peel, Sir Robert: continued. and Ministry's dependence on House of Commons, 154-7.
 analysis of election results by, 189, 190.
 on virtual representation, 191.
 and Roman Catholic Emancipation, 30, 189, 199.
 and Reform Bill, 1832, 202, 204 (note), 207.
 his Tamworth Manifesto, 206-7, 284, 286.
 and dissolution of 1841, 208-11.
 and repeal of the Corn Laws, 211-13.
 his manifesto of 1847, 214.
 on men and measures, 240-1.
 on general elections in times of excitement, 273-5.
 on adverse by-elections, 276-7.
 on 'the people', 314 (note).
 other references to, 79, 250, 270, 310.
- Pelham, Henry, 132, 287.
- People, The: influence of, through public opinion, 6, 7, 34 ff., 172, 175.
 Ministries dependent on, 159-67.
 attitude of, in eighteenth century, 182-7. alleged submissions to, 192-8.
 mandate from, 199 ff.
 influence on submission of issues, 262-4.
 capacity to deal with questions of policy, 293, 308-11.
 meanings of the expression, 312-15.
- Perceval, Spencer, 144-5.
- Petitions:
 sketch of history of, in relation to public opinion, 73-80.
 for dissolution of Parliament, 184-7.
 other references to, 36-7.
- Pitt, William (the elder), see Chatham, 1st Earl of.
- Pitt, William (the younger):
 and public opinion, 57-9.
 on petitioning, 76.
 on the King's choice of Ministers, 143-4.
 on Ministry's dependence on House of Commons, 152-3.
 on virtual representation, 191.
 on connexion between general elections and views of the people, 194-5.
 other references to, 55, 89, 107, 114, 123-4, 151, 187, 196.
- Place, Francis, 10.
- Placemen, agitation against, 22, 46, 181.
- Pledges by Members of Parliament, 5, 19-20.
- Plunket, W. C. (after 1827 1st Baron Plunket), 90.
- Political associations:
 sketch of history of, in relation to public opinion, 87-97.
 influence of, on submission of issues, 259.
- Pollard, A. F., 309.
- Porritt, Edward, 25.
- Portland, 3rd Duke of, 144.
- Press, the, and public opinion:
 in seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, 36-8.
 in modern times, 64-5.
- Proportional representation, probable effect of, 306-8.
- Protection, see Free Trade and Tariff Reform.
- Public Health legislation, public opinion and, 62.
- Public meetings, sketch of history of, in relation to public opinion, 80-7.
- Public opinion, 6, 7, 34 ff., 172, 175.
- Pultney, William (after 1742 Earl of Bath), 40, 104.
- Referendum, arguments for and against, 295-9, 308.
- Representation:
 early character of, 1.
 reform of, 2-4, 82-3, 92, 199-205, 214, 215. principles of, 32-3.
 local, 5, 6, 8.
 national, 6 (and note), 24-7.
 defective, hinders sense of people being gathered, 187-91.
 virtual, 191-2.
 accurate, as alternative to effective decision by the people, 306-8.
 and see Statutes.
- Representative government, and direct government, 5, 6.
- Riot, offence of, 86.
- Robinson, John, 114, 197.
- Robinson, Sir Thomas, 120.
- Rockingham, 2nd Marquis of, 88, 132.
- Roman Catholic Emancipation, 30, 90-1, 189, 199, 267-8.
- Romilly, Sir Samuel:
 and pledges, 24.
 on King's choice of Ministers, 144.
- Rose, Sir Philip, 193.

- Rosebery, 5th Earl of:
 appointed Prime Minister, 149.
 on bribery of the electorate, 251.
 and the election of 1895, 255, 262.
 other references to, 49, 279.
- Russell, Lord John (after 1861 1st Earl):
 on the press and public opinion, 64.
 and dependence of the Ministry on House of Commons, 154-7.
 and Reform Bill, 1832, 201.
 and dissolution of 1841, 210, 240.
 and resignation in 1866, 215.
- Russia, 'armament against, Pitt (the younger) and, 57-8.
- Sadler, Michael, 60-1.
- Salisbury, 3rd Marquis of (till 1865 Lord Robert Cecil, from 1865 to 1868 Viscount Cranborne):
 on public opinion, 70.
 on dependence of Ministry on result of general election, 164.
 and Ministerial crisis of 1885, 218.
 and need for popular mandate, 219, 220.
 his election manifesto, in 1892, 289-90.
 on stale mandates, 302.
- Scarlett, Sir James (after 1835 1st Baron Abinger), 191.
- Schnadhorst, Francis, 135.
- Sedition, offence of, 84-6.
- Shaftesbury, 1st Earl of, 15, 35, 74, 131, 187.
- Shaftesbury, 7th Earl of, see Ashley, Lord.
- Shaw, Baron, 28.
- Shebbeare, John, 38.
- Shelburne, 2nd Earl of, 88-9, 114.
- Shippen, William, 104, 282 (and note).
- Sidney, Algernon, 25.
- Sièyès, Abbé, 314.
- Slavery, see Anti-slavery movement.
- Social legislation, influence of public opinion on, 59-63.
- Somers, Baron, 173, 270.
- Somerset, Lord Granville, 133.
- South African War, 1899-1901, 31, 225, 230.
- Sovereign, the:
 his own party in Parliament, 103-4.
 choice of Ministers by, 141-9.
 influence over elections, 168-78.
 and dissolutions of Parliament, 162, 212, 280.
- Spain, War with (1739), 46-9.
- Speech, the official, used for stating election issues, 281-4.
- Stanley, Lord, see Derby, 14th Earl of.
- Statutes:
 13 Chas. II, c. 1 (Treasonable and Seditious Practices, 1661), 36.
 13 Chas. II, c. 5 (Public Petitions, 1661), 36, 74.
 1 Will. III & Mary (Session 2), c. 2 (Bill of Rights, 1688), 37, 74.
 6 & 7 Will. III & Mary, c. 2 (Triennial Act, 1694), 265.
 7 & 8 Will. III, c. 4 (Corrupt Practices, 1695), 205.
 10 Anne, c. 19 (Customs and Excise, 1712), 38.
 1 Geo. I, Stat. 2, c. 38 (Septennial Act, 1715), 239, 265-6, 271-2.
 2 Geo. II, c. 24 (Corrupt Practices, 1729), 205.
 15 Geo. II, c. 22 (Offices under the Crown, 1742), 46.
 26 Geo. II, c. 26 (Naturalization of Jews, 1753), 45-6.
 39 Geo. III, c. 79 (Unlawful Societies, 1799), 89, 92.
 57 Geo. III, c. 19 (Seditious Meetings, 1817), 82, 90.
 59 Geo. III, c. 66 (Factory Regulation, 1819), 60.
 60 Geo. III & 1 Geo. IV, c. 6 (Seditious Meetings, 1819), 82.
 60 Geo. III & 1 Geo. IV, c. 9 (Stamp Duties on Newspapers, 1819), 64.
 10 Geo. IV, c. 7 (Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, 1829), 30, 199.
 2 & 3 Will. IV, c. 45 (Reform Act, 1832), 2, 3, 199-205.
 3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 103 (Factory Regulation, 1833), 61.
 5 & 6 Vict., c. 99 (Mines and Collieries, 1842), 61.
 11 & 12 Vict., c. 63 (Public Health Act, 1848), 62.
 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102 (Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854), 205.
 30 & 31 Vict., c. 102 (Reform Act, 1867), 214, 215.
 31 & 32 Vict., c. 125 (Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868), 205.
 35 & 36 Vict., c. 15 (Parks Regulation Act, 1872), 83.
 35 & 36 Vict., c. 33 (Ballot Act, 1872), 205.
 46 & 47 Vict., c. 51 (Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act, 1884), 205.

Statutes: continued.

- 48 Vict., c. 3 (Representation of the People Act, 1884), 4, 219.
 51 & 52 Vict., c. 64 (Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888), 86.
 56 & 57 Vict., c. 66 (Rules Publication Act, 1893), 168.
 2 Edw. VII, c. 42 (Education Act, 1902), 225.
 8 Edw. VII, c. 66 (Public Meetings Act, 1908), 87.
 1 & 2 Geo. V, c. 13 (Parliament Act, 1911), 232, 234, 272.
 7 & 8 Geo. V, c. 64 (Representation of the People Act, 1918), 4, 251, 305.
 9 & 10 Geo. V, c. 21 (Ministry of Health Act, 1919), 69.
 10 & 11 Geo. V, c. 50 (Mining Industry Act, 1920), 69.
 17 & 18 Geo. V, c. 22 (Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act, 1927), 95.
 Stocks, J. L., 33.
 Strikes and lock-outs, for purpose of influencing public opinion, 95-6.
 Subordinate legislation, publication of, 68-9.
 Swift, Jonathan, 37, 169, 175, 188, 313.
 Switzerland, referendum in, 297-8.
 Tamworth Manifesto, 206-7, 284, 286.
 Tariff reform, 225-8, 257, 261.
 Temperley, H. W. V., 48.
 Thomas, J. H., 32.
 Three-party system, effect of, 112, 252, 279, 280, 307.
 Thurlow, 1st Baron, 150.
 Tracts, political:
 and public opinion, 37-8.
 and elections in connexion with policy, 178-81.
 used for formulation of issues, 283.
 Trade unions:
 and Members of Parliament as delegates, 27-8.
 as political associations, 94.
 Treason, high, offence of, 86-7.
 Treasury, election management by, 171.
 Trevelyan, G. M., 101, 123, 175.
 Tutchin, John, 37, 84.
 United States of America, comparison with working of Constitution in, 10, 97, 111, 244, 280-1.
 Unlawful assembly, offence of, 84-6.

Victoria, Queen:

- on the party system, 112.
 and the choice of Prime Ministers, 148-9.
 and dependence of Ministries on results of general elections, 163-5.
 and the use of dissolutions of Parliament, 162, 212.
 and the official Speech, 282-3.
 Virtual representation, 191-2.
 'Votes' of House of Commons, publication of, 38-9.
 Walpole, Horace (after 1791 4th Earl of Orford), 50-1, 88, 107, 143, 185.
 Walpole, Horatio (after 1756 1st Baron Walpole), 22, 129.
 Walpole, Sir Robert (after 1742 1st Earl of Orford):
 and public opinion, 37-8.
 on publication of parliamentary debates, 40.
 and Excise Scheme, 38, 41-4.
 and War of Jenkins' Ear, 46-9.
 and corporate responsibility, 104, 150.
 circumstances of resignation of, 105, 113, 154, 160.
 and party meetings, 129.
 and party organization, 131-2.
 other references to, 22, 23 (note), 118, 238, 272.
 Walpole, Spencer, 163.
 War of 1914-18, see Great War.
 Webb, Sidney and Beatrice, 311.
 Wedderburn, Alexander (after 1780 1st Baron Loughborough), 29.
 Wellington, 1st Duke of:
 on pledges, 20.
 on the King's choice of Ministers, 147.
 and Reform Bill, 1832, 200, 202.
 and dissolution of 1841, 210, 282.
 on men and measures, 240-1.
 his resignation in 1830, 269.
 Wharnccliffe, 1st Baron, 203.
 Wharton, Baron (later 1st Marquis of), 131.
 Whigs:
 and pledges, 19.
 party organization of, 132-3.
 Whips, Party, 131, 133.
 Wilberforce, Samuel, 29.
 Wilkes, John, 2, 19, 23, 30, 53-4, 87, 107, 282.
 William III:
 parties under, 100-2.
 choice of Ministers by, 141.
 election management under, 160.

William III: continued.

royal influence over elections, 172-
4, 266, 282.

William IV:

and public meetings, 82.

and choice of Ministers, 147-8.

and Reform Bill, 1832, 273.

Wilson, President Woodrow, 244.

Wyndham, Sir William, 26, 40, 42, 272.

Wyvill, Christopher, 88.

Yonge, Sir William, 25, 26.

